woe—the medical profession, which by its researches in the chemical world and its incessant and protracted pursuit of the recondite origin of disease and of the philosophy of suffering and despair, as well as of the sources of vigor and hope and happiness to mankind, has placed civilization under the largest debt that is due to any of the learned orders or society; that profession, sir, has not failed to stamp upon alcohol the mark of Cain among poisons. It is the murderer of men. That noble profession has brought it to the doors of the Capitol, and charged it with the wholesale death of our people. They assail it as the pestilence which walketh in the darkness and which wasteth in the noonday—as the parent of every crime, as the cup of misery ever full; the prolific source of ignorance, poverty, squalor, idiocy, insanity in all its dreadful forms, personal ruin, social destruction, national ruin—the prime agency of hell on the earth. And with them come all classes and conditions of men. These are not witnesses whose testimony can be denied or gainsaid. I will not speak of woman in rags and disheveled hair, with her wan cheek and hollow voice, nor of her children shivering on the corners of the street, starving within the shadow of churches built to the Most High with the price of their blood. It is not fitting here to be sentimental, nor would I attempt it if permitted. The gravity of the occasion has passed beyond all necessity of resort to touching tales and strokes of pathetic imagery. The evil is before us. Its infinite extent must be admitted. There is nothing to be considered but the remedy and its application. I have endeavored to present one that seems to me to have been born of hope.

"This measure is not proposed by any party that now exists. I trust that it will encounter opposition from no party whatever. It has been prepared with the knowledge of scarcely any one. I am alone responsible for it. It is not the project of "temperance men," as they are sometimes called, whether derisively or otherwise. On the contrary, mistaking its true character and misconceiving its far-reaching consequences and its avoidance of conflict with the interests and passions of the present time, "temperance men" have complained that it is an evasion of the conflict. I fear that fifteen years of agitation will convince such of us as may then be alive that this objection does not recognize the great power of existing forces which must be overcome. It should be remembered that no battle is won until the enemy is driven from his position. He is now intrenched in the Constitution of this country. The battle may go on, as it has gone on for fifty years, without one single blow being struck at the manufacture of alcohol. And, as hitherto, "men may come and men may go" and thousands may continue to fall on either side, yet the battle remain forever undecided, because the struggle, however violent, is renewed forever by the recruits of successive generations. There is no concentration of forces upon the main position. Effort is lost because misdirected. Much of it, to be sure, is not wholly lost. Moral suasion—that is, argument and precept and exhortation, from the pulpit, the rostrum, the press, and private admonition—molds public opinion and accomplishes wonders for individual men, but it lacks the powerful re-enforcement of national law. That it can never get until it asks for and demands it.

"This revolution in national law can be wrought only by years of agitation and effort. Local sentiment must be awakened almost everywhere. In at least two-thirds of the country existing opinion must be reversed before the Constitution of the country in this respect can be changed. Meanwhile each State retains all the power it now has over both fermented and distilled liquors, and as soon as this measure has been ratified there would be conferred upon the States largely increased control over both. Discussion and effort would demand the attention of the nation as such, and a concentration of the whole army upon a comprehensive plan of battle to carry the citadel would be substituted for isolated and sporadic warfare. And when the battle is once gained it is won for all time. This form of effort is infinitely the best way in which to accomplish local reform. The facts and arguments upon which the temperance reform is based are the same, whether urged to influence the action of the individual, the local opinion, or Legislature of a single State, or the nation at large; and the modification of the national Constitution involves that universal local effort and the creation of that public sentiment everywhere which will result in the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory State and Territorial laws.

"Temperance men object because the first clause of this amendment if adopted does not become operative until 1900. They fear that they will die without the sight. So they may, but how can they object until they have tried to see whether they can obtain even this? Consider the past. Be admonished by history. Do not lose everything by attempting the impracticable. Remember that this is an effort to procure the enactment of a law, which must carry the heads and hearts of conservative jurists, of dignified and unconvinced legislators, and the popular vote. This is a different thing from enthusing a popular assembly under the magnetism of Mr. Gough. Do not forget either that it is to be the act of the nation; that, however it may be as between God and alcohol, however it may be between the maker of alcohol and the higher law, yet we as a nation have assured the maker and dealer in liquor that he might vest his capital in permanent forms, that he might manufacture this article for all purposes whatever, and that we would protect him in the enjoyment of his capital and the production of his still. We take from his industry yearly vast sums in the way of taxation for the support of the Government. True this legalized destruction of national wealth infinitely transcends the advantage of the tax, but nevertheless we have legalized the traffic for a century. Now, have we as a nation any right at once to destroy his industry and turn the distiller and his family upon the street to starve? Is he not entitled to reasonable notice of the change in the national policy, that he may gradually divert his capital and turn his business capacity in some other direction and train his son in some other employment? And if this view does not strike you with force, then consider the further fact that there are more than $500,000,000, probably $1,000,000,000, vested in this traffic to-day in the United States, and that such an interest will for many years to come have sufficient power to defeat any measure which destroys it at once.

"But liquor makers and sellers are men. Great numbers of them are respectable and honest men. I have no sympathy with the wholesale denunciation of them as a criminal class. Many of them recognize the dreadful consequences which flow from the business in which they are engaged; yet it is a lawful business. Circumstances over which often they have no control have identified them with it just as others have found their way into the pulpit, into Congress, or into other avocations of life. It is no more just to denounce them as cold-hearted villains, intent upon nothing but the destruction of mankind, than it is to assail the personal integrity of every man who ever owned a slave. If approached in a proper spirit with a proposed reform in which they should be recognized as men and invited and urged upon considerations which must influence any humane being, and which would give them a chance to save themselves and their families, I believe that the actual co-operation of many liquor makers and sellers could be secured.

"Since the introduction of this resolution it has been attacked as a palpable effort to curry favor with the prohibitory sentiment of the country and at the same time avoid offense to the 'beer element.' It is no such thing. This measure is not of that radical nature to command the vehement approbation of what are known as prohibitory men, though it must and I trust will command increasingly their approval. But the question of the manufacture and use of fermented liquors is left where it now is, with the States, because it is medically still an open question whether the restricted use of such liquors is not beneficial to the people, although their use is fast becoming excessive and an abuse. But there is very slight difference of opinion as to the destructive tendency of distilled liquors as administered by the "laity," and all agree that the great mass of the evils of intemperance arise from their manufacture and use as a beverage. And if the ban of the law can be placed upon the manufacture and use of distilled alcoholic liquors as a beverage, the minor abuses resulting from fermented liquors can well be left wholly to the restraining powers of the States, as enlarged by the second clause of the proposed amendment. While by no means of a callous organization, I certainly do not complain of criticism which attacks my personal motives, some of which has been brought to my attention. Those motives are not relevant to the measure itself. And whatever may be said by others, I am consoled by the consciousness that this step is taken after long reflection, that my motives are satisfactory to myself, and that they will be judged by the only tribunal to whom they can be surely known, and whose approval is of much consequence.

"The opposition of the consumer to any national measure which should at once deprive him of his beverage would be found to be very serious and I fear decisive. But there is no class of men who have a stronger desire to see their children saved from the chains which hold them to their own dreadful doom than the drunkards of this country. This measure has been sneered at as a proposed reform—for posterity. So it is; and as such it ought and I think will enlist the overwhelming force of parental feeling in its favor whenever the public mind has studied its peculiar features and elements of strength.

"I think that existing parties may well hesitate to oppose this measure. The cause it represents is one of moral reform, and it must be re-enforced by legislation. In due time it will be. If neither of the great parties now dividing the country sees fit to antagonize it, this measure will force its way without being made the source and object of political strife. Becoming operative so long in the future, it ought not to provoke the opposition of any political organization, and all men should be able to consider this subject calmly and to decide upon its merits.

"If it is a measure enlisting the moral convictions and humane sentiments of the people, and especially of that nucleus of able, conscientious, and aggressive men who are ultimately the ruling power in every progressive nation, although for years they may struggle on fighting and dying under the banner of defeat, it will be well for all parties that would live to beware how they oppose this proposition. At least let it have fair consideration by the House and the country, for it is a subject which will have consideration. It is not a ghost, nor will it "down." I ask for it the considerate attention of all men now, for the time is coming when it will be forced upon them. The political exigency which absorbs and distracts the country will pass away, but this evil will not pass away. Its extirpation will be imperiously demanded long after the question of the succession to the Presidency shall have been settled whether by peace or by war. Public men will be destroyed who touch it, but the cause will survive. Stronger arms will uphold and advance the banner until victory floats on its ample folds; and the Constitution of the country shall yet become the pledge of sobriety and temperance among the people, the ally of virtue, and not the charter of this great source of ignorance, misery, and crime."

IMPORTANCE OF STATE AND LOCAL-OPTION MOVEMENTS.

May I be pardoned a further word? The movements of the present time for prohibitory amendments of State constitutions and for statutory prohibition and regulation, including the system of "local-option" effort, are of great importance, especially as the means of temporary restraint and as the centers of agitation and means of creating enlightened public opinion; but such is the nature and scope of the evil and such are the relations of the general and special or State governments to each other, that nothing but a movement based upon the national idea presents a clear prospect of permanent success. The same and greater difficulties arise in all action for the permanent or even temporary suppression of the liquor traffic that does not include aggressive co-operation of the National Government which ruined the country under the Articles of Confederation, and which did not abate until the whole subject of commerce, foreign and between the States, was placed under the control of one sovereign power. The combination of local and national effort is indispensable to the desired end. Neither can prevail without the other; neither can be postponed for the other without harm. Let everybody throw a stone at the liquor traffic, each in his own way, when he is so organized that he can not or will not use prepared ammunition nor shoot with the regulation gun.

But still the fact will remain, that to ignore or delay the movement for a prohibitory amendment of the national Constitution so that it may be reserved to be a Yorktown rather than a Bunker Hill—that is to say, a crowning rather than a preliminary battle—is to decide to fight as a mass of individuals or an isolation of States rather than as a trained army with a general plan of campaign and a national concentration of organized power for the destruction of an organized national curse.

It is a division and misdirection of power, where combination and definite aim are required to give substantial success. It is time that the prohibitory idea should assume that control of national parties, at least of the Republican party, which belongs to a sentiment that is the conviction of three-fourths of the people in that party. The Republican party can not remain permanently three-fourths for prohibition and one-fourth against it. That is less possible than it once was for the nation to remain permanently half slave and half free. Ideas never compromise. They contend for mastery, but they never conciliate nor coalesce. We are at the dividing of the ways—

> The crisis presses on us,
> Face to face with us it stands,
> With its solemn lips of question,
> Like the Sphinx on Egypt's sands.

ACTION.

But I feel like indicating my own inclination for action on the subject. For one I have been down here in this hole long enough. Sooner or later, and I trust not much later, I hope we may come to ourselves, like the prodigal, and proceed to climb up and out. I will remain here so long as I think I can persuade others to climb with me, in order that we may stand on each other's shoulders and that those first out may lift the remainder with proper tackle—for the hole is very deep. Only for this will I remain longer in the hole, and for this I will remain if need be a great while. Others may if they will—and they will—stay here permanently; but, sir, they will find that the masses of the Republican party and of the American people of all parties prefer to be on top of the ground, where there is less dirt, plenty of fresh air, something good to eat and fit to drink, and one can see across the country. Besides, it may interest some to observe that this hole has already begun to cave in, and that the gravel is disagreeable in one's mouth and eyes.

Why not let the order be given to rally on top of the ground? But there are too many who like, or at least think it best, to stay in the hole, and are even now busy drawing the hole in after them.

To this in their cases I do not object. It is well that the dead be buried, and if they can be induced to perform the work for themselves it will prove that they can still be useful to mankind.

But who that is alive desires to be buried alive?

Emerson advised the young man to "hitch his wagon to a star." To follow such advice might be dangerous for conservative parties like us, but to mortals who still breathe even this would have advantages over a permanent location under forty feet of soil. All the great living issues of the day—industrial, social, educational, political—are one; they stand or fall together. Temperance is one with them and they are one with it. It is even now the chief practical remedial issue for the workingmen and working women of this land. The temperance reform and the labor reform are the same reform, and you can not long separate the agencies which promote them nor prevent the inevitable union of those whose salvation depends upon them—the common people of the world.

It may be suggested in reply to this that it is better for the party to eject these pestilent fellows at once, that peace may return. But I know of some who are not thus to be disposed of and who are inclined to claim their rights to remain, and to insist that if anybody is to quit they shall go who would use the party as a means to curse and not to bless mankind. Besides, the issue is not raised by individuals, and no matter who is driven from the ranks the evil is the same; the issue is open, and must be met and decided by the American people all the same. On this occasion I have spoken partly as a Republican. But, sir, I do this only because I believe that thus do I speak most as an American, most as a man. That party, with all its faults and shortcomings and failures to reach unto its own ideals, I revere as the great agency which, under God, saved the country and secured its future. That party will yet, from the laws of its superior being and unfinished mission, concentrate its tremendous energies and perfected equipment upon this gigantic national evil until it is destroyed and for the promotion of every other cause which concerns the national welfare.

But, sir, we must advance. Our generation is passing away. Let not those of us who have chiefly done our work forget that the nation will survive us, and that the tree of liberty will be full of sap after we have passed away. Let us die in the direction of hope. If the victory come not in our time nor to our advantage, let those who bury us have reason to embalm our hearts, that in the thick fight which is between us and the holy land chieftains who command our children shall, like the crusader, cast the sacred relics far forward into the ranks of the foe. So may the armies of the Cross win victories from the memory of our devotion to the right.

Let us, at least, leave behind the example of unflinching and unselfish valor put forth in a sublime cause—a cause which it is duty to uphold even though complete success may linger until our warfare is ended, and our sacrifices and calamities, if any there be, endured for its promotion, shall be long overpast.

I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

[During the delivery of Mr. BLAIR's remarks the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, when, by unanimous consent, the regular order was postponed and Mr. BLAIR allowed to conclude his speech.]

BODIES FOR DISSECTION—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith return Senate bill No. 349, entitled "An act for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves," without my approval.

The purpose of this bill is to permit the delivery of certain dead bodies to the medical colleges located in the District of Columbia for dissection.

Such disposition of the bodies of unknown and pauper dead is only excused by the necessity of acquiring by this means proper and useful anatomical knowledge; and the laws by which it is permitted should, in deference to a decent and universal sentiment, carefully guard against abuse and needless offense.

The measure under consideration does not with sufficient care specify and limit the officers and the parties who it is proposed to invest with discretion in the disposition of dead bodies remaining in the institutions and places mentioned in the bill. The second section indicates an intention to prevent the use of said bodies for any other purpose than the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and to secure, after such use, the decent burial of the remains. It declares that a bond shall be given providing for the performance of these conditions. But instead of exacting the bond from the medical colleges, to which alone by the terms of the first section the bodies are to be delivered, such bond is required of "every physician or surgeon before receiving such dead body."

The bill also provides that a relative by blood or marriage, or a friend, may, within forty-eight hours after death, demand that any body be buried, upon satisfying "the authorities of the relationship claimed to the deceased."

The "authorities" to be thus satisfied should be clearly defined; and the determination of a question so important should be left with those only who will perform this duty with proper care and consideration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1886.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report of Mr. Somerville P. Tuck, appointed to carry out certain provisions of section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801," approved January 20, 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1886.

STATEN ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to give notice that as early next week as possible I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 121) known as the Staten Island bridge bill. I am glad that one of the Senators from New Jersey is now presiding in the Senate, and he will of course take notice.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, to report it with certain amendments and to submit a written report thereon. I give notice that on Wednesday morning, after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

MAGDALENA REHKOPF.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3351) granting a pension to Mrs. Magdalena Rehkopf.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment to the bill, as the name was correct in the bill as it originally came from the other House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names and locations.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 22d instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 633) to change the name of Uniontown to Anacostia; and

An act (S. 1476) to amend the act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin."

The message also announced that the President had, on this day, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 761) granting a pension to William Webster; and

An act (S. 1125) granting a pension to Noah Nelson.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. HARRIS. Before proceeding to the consideration of the unfinished business, I should be glad to have the Senate dispose of the motion I submitted on Thursday, to refer the message of the President in regard to the creation of a labor commission to the Committee on the Judiciary. The message came in on Thursday, and I moved that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion to print was agreed to, but the motion to refer remains suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee move the reference?

Mr. HARRIS. I did make that motion on Thursday; the motion is doubtless of record. If it is not, I now move that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to a vote on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee being put now, but I do not desire to have anything interfere with the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill until it is finished. I do not wish to have anything that will take any time to come up.

Mr. BLAIR. Is a motion pending to refer the message to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that motion will not prevail. Of course it is the same subject-matter for the consideration of which the Committee on Education and Labor was created. This identical proposition will be found——

Mr. CULLOM. If there is to be any discussion I shall have to object to the consideration of the matter at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion will go over, and the unfinished business will now be proceeded with.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from New Jersey now occupying the chair. The Chair will state that as the amendment proposes an additional section its consideration is not necessary to the text of the bill at this time. The Chair therefore asks that the amendment lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CULLOM. Then all the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey will be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be taken.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before making a few remarks on the bill under consideration, I desire to suggest a few amendments to be printed and considered in their proper order. It is not necessary that I should read them all, but I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to one or two. In section 19, line 3, after the word "pooling," I propose to insert:

Also the system known as stock-watering.

Then I propose to add as an additional section the following:

All suits for damages and penalties when brought by individuals may be brought in the State courts of the State where cause of action originated or penalty was incurred, and the railroad corporations against whom suit is so brought are hereby prohibited from transferring the same to any Federal court.

Mr. SPOONER. Would such a provision be valid?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suppose that is a matter which can be corrected by statute. I apprehend the power to prohibit the removal of suits from State courts is within the reach of statute.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I understood that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] is to be the amendment now before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment pending was that offered by the Senator from New Jersey, the present occupant of the chair, and that has gone over.

Mr. CULLOM. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia if he understands his amendment to be now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk informs the Chair that the amendment has not been formally offered. The Senator from West Virginia gave notice that he would offer the amendment and addressed the Senate upon the question.

Mr. CAMDEN. I understand my amendment to be pending.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not pending, according to the statement of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can move it now. There is no record to show that it is pending at this time.

Mr. CAMDEN. Then I move the amendment of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all of section 4, from line 1 to line 18, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation, for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter distance, on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

Mr. CAMDEN. I also desire to offer another amendment, which is to strike out, in lines 5 and 6 of section 4, the words "and from the same original point of departure."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] has the floor on the pending amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, the people have reason to take courage that some advance has been made, at least in sentiment, during the last year on the question of transportation.

The report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the speeches thus far delivered have recognized the great wrongs done the producing interest of the nation by railroad corporations, and have shown their violation of human laws and utter disregard of everything sacred.

The committee are inducing the people to expect some radical and effective legislation, which is not entirely sustained by the bill presented.

Last session I was antagonized by this committee and many Senators on the proposition that no greater charge should be made for a short haul than a long one.

I have a right to feel rejoiced that the proposition then advocated against great odds has been fully adopted by the committee, and indulge the hope that Senators who so persistently denied its justice will see it as the committee do and give it their cheerful support.

LONG AND SHORT HAUL.

We need it in the West for local shippers. A prorate charge is not asked; only that for hauling 50 miles they shall not charge more than for hauling 500. It seems idle to say this will necessarily raise the through rate. That can not possibly be done.

The through rate is now nearly confiscation. Another raise would amount to prohibition.

The producer now realizes barely the cost of producing. When two bushels are taken to get the third to market, it is demonstrated that the farmer, after cost of producing and paying taxes and interest money, has not sufficient left to make good the necessary wear and tear of the farm.

THROUGH RATES EXCESSIVE.

Already the rates in some cases are prohibition. During last session that charge was established when I alleged that in portions of Nebraska the people were compelled to burn corn for fuel; that in some sections it required 150 bushels of corn to purchase 1 ton of hard coal. People in the East were startled by the fact, while in Nebraska some of the editorial fraternity, who think the highest position in life is to do the bidding of railroad corporations, and proud to be ordered by the magnates, aided, no doubt, by their own innate cussedness, having no feeling in common with the Syrian when he humbly protested "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?" But these fellows rejoice to be not only servant, but dog.

For stating this fact they charged that I was an enemy of the State; that immigration would cease where such gross oppression, extortion, and injustice were allowed; but immigration did not cease. The whole country realized that a State with soil so rich and productive, with people so industrious, standing at the head of all the States in intelligence, with a less percentage of those unable to read and write, with more soldiers of the late war to its population than any other State—where such men, on such soil, with such extortions, could live and toil and be happy, was one of the best places to find a home, and they came by hundreds and thousands, and will aid in the work of emancipating labor and breaking the gyves of corporations on the limbs of that young and growing Commonwealth.

A year has passed; the world denounced the heartlessness of corporations that would force the necessity of using but what effect did that have with those who had forged the chains, fastened them on the limbs of the young giant, and hold, as they think, the key securely? No concession to humanity, no yielding to the entreaties of toil.

The homesteader, with his wife and children, toiling long months and weary days, plow and sow, cultivate and gather, and then haul 150 bushels of corn to the depot and take home barely 1 ton of hard coal. In other portions of the State more fortunate he can exchange probably 100 bushels or less of corn for 1 ton of hard coal. This does not apply to the entire State; but during the last winter in more than one half its territory the people were compelled to BURN CORN FOR FUEL BECAUSE OF EXCESSIVE THROUGH RATES.

Then millionaire officers and well-paid attorneys and frail editors will argue that the rates are not excessive, because not as much so as more excessive rates charged in other places. But here is the fact that to a large section the coal dug out of the earth by the hand of labor in Pennsylvania can not be exchanged for corn raised by the hand of labor in Nebraska. The rate must be excessive, because it is prohibitory.

The farmers in Western States during the last winter have been converting their corn into beef and pork, and now the through rates are so excessive that they will scarcely realize in return the meager price or value of the corn.

If the farmer in Nebraska can find a better market farther west for corn, the railroad actually charges him on 300 miles' transportation the same freight as for 800 miles east, so that now the basis of charges is "all the traffic will bear." The railroad rulers, stronger than Government, are determined that the farmer shall have only the privilege of they taking the lion's share, and allowing for himself the usual third, and if that will furnish him beyond ordinary subsistence then his share is made still less.

We are in the midst of depression, and all other pursuits must be laid under contribution so that full dividends shall be declared on watered stocks and fraudulent bonds; grain, beef, and pork may be reduced one-half in price; no abatement in charges on transportation. All industries must not only sustain their loss, but help make good the losses of corporations. No sympathy for the laborer, whose pay is reduced; no sympathy for producers, whose products are reduced one-third to one-half; but a dismal groan ascends for ever and ever from a portion of the press and from legislative halls if railroad bonds and stocks do not receive full returns. The people have been patient and long-suffering, and the cry is even now going up, "How long, O Lord, how long!"

When Senators who delight to be called conservative, when a committee free from radicalism or demagogism boldly acknowledge and proclaim the great wrongs and violations and robberies committed by corporations, that would seem to be the "end of the law and the testimony."

Then the great question comes, to redress these wrongs, to prevent their repetition, and give the people a remedy against the extortions.

NO COMMISSION.

This bill in declaring certain principles is well. Annexing a commission with large salaries and little power is not what the people are demanding.

The commission will be no better informed to declare what legislation and punishment are needed than this committee of distinguished Senators after visiting important points and conferring with persons of different views and giving a year to its careful consideration.

The results from State commissions are too meager to induce a high admiration for that tribunal. The corporations are becoming earnest advocates for a national commission, expecting it to prevent them from being too severely squeezed in the tender embraces of each other, with no power to protect the people from their rapacity.

EXTORTION IN RATES WEST OF THE MISSOURI RIVER.

You would suppose the Pacific road, built by the generosity of the nation, so that in its construction millions were divided in profits, then cities, precincts, and counties often bonded to build branches, depots, and machine-shops, would allow the people of small means but great courage, contending with the privations of pioneer life, to share in the beneficence of the nation. But not so. West of the Missouri River the rates are about fourfold greater than east of the river.

In their early history, Kansas and Nebraska were told there are but few people to transport, but little of freight to haul, you must be charged for railroad and telegraph service fourfold; but now those States are populous, the productions marvelous, but the discrimination continues. The imports are equally marvelous. All the lumber must be transported from the Northern pineries; they can obtain none within their own borders.

The Government protects the labor of the farmer west of the Missouri by imposing a tariff of from one to three dollars on a thousand feet, which goes into the pockets of the pine barons of the North, and then tolerates a charge to the dwellers west of the Missouri fourfold, and this goes into the pockets of the millionaire lords of the rail, with no protection to the people from State or national legislation. In this Government of the people, by the people, for the people, the people have really but small voice. True, they have the right to vote; that is for the men whom corporations, through the machinations of ring politicians and manipulations of county and State conventions, put in nomination; and then the same corporations shirk the honest portion of taxation by owning or controlling State boards, and at the first demonstration against their robberies the civil power must be called, then the military ordered out to protect their stolen millions, and all this expense, even the transportation of troops over their own roads, must be borne by the toiling millions, who can not shirk the burdens of taxation.

THE IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT.

Every year by slow stages the opposing ideas and forces and camps are nearing each other. For years capital has been organized—bold, unscrupulous, rapacious, God and law defying—moving as did Gould, according to his sworn testimony, in New York; and Huntington, by the evidence of his own written history, upon State Legislatures, upon the courts, and the Congress of the United States, unblushingly purchasing judges and legislators. In any monarchy or kingdom in Europe their "sins would have found them out" and punishment followed; in a republic, they despise the people and control its representatives.

But the issue is approaching. Labor heretofore, in scattered and incoherent forces, was easily captured, driven from the field, and trampled beneath the feet of organized capital.

But the impending crisis is coming. As in the days of slavery and in all the past and will be in the future, there has been and ever will be an irrepressible conflict between freedom and slavery, between right and wrong.

The greater the effort to smother and subdue the demand for justice and right the more certain and determined the struggle, and, no matter at what cost, the final victory. The feeling of injustice and wrong in the human heart of the one or the multitude can never be quenched. The heavier the burden the more certain and violent will be the outbreak. As well expect the hidden, seething fires in the earth's bosom could be restrained or checked from eruption by piling mountain after mountain upon them, as to attempt to deaden in the heart the fires kindled by extortion and avarice, or seek to check by piling a greater volume of atrocities.

This dynamite thus generated in the human heart will explode by reason of the great burden by which you seek to repress it, and will produce the very disasters you pretend to fear. Can you make the men of this nation or any other believe that the four billions—a sum greater than ever was our national debt—of watered stocks and bonds is honest property and really deserves protection from courts or Legislatures?

Can you make the men of America believe that the three hundred millions claimed by Vanderbilt and the two hundred millions claimed by Gould were honestly obtained?

WHAT THEN?

This fiction of property above all things needs that protection which can only be secured by recognition and manly concessions to other interests that are real and to labor. A huge volume of fictions, printed on paper by conspirators against the nation's prosperity, and then called values, property, inverted and standing upon the small end, reeling and vibrating, as quotations among the gamblers in Wall street attest, by the least breath of discontent—the owners of these fictions, of all men, should accord decent treatment to the remainder of mankind from whom they expect to force dividends and interest on the stolen four billions.

History in the annals of crime always repeats itself; and the holders of illicit gains always presume that bold, aggressive conduct will insure abject submission. Slavery made that fatal mistake. The English lords who stole Ireland's land made that mistake. Now the plutocrats of America will not profit by their example. Do not say that I judge harshly. The Senate committee have incorporated these facts substantially in their report. But they fail at the point where the monster evil should be grappled by the strong arm of the law.

If the industries of this nation were only required to pay fair dividends on the real cost of railroads we would be prosperous to-day. Certainly, the committee's report says we were prosperous when roads were building and money being spent, just as the individual improving his property by borrowing and spending $10,000, but in order to raise the $10,000 has given a mortgage of $30,000, on which he is to pay yearly interest. You will not wait long to see the end and ruin of that man.

The committee point with pride to the many miles of rails within our borders as evidence of wealth. So it would be if the nation was not charged up and taxed for sufficient to build triple the number of miles.

Then they assert too many roads have been built on parallel lines to make a pretext for speculation and fraudulent issue of stocks and bonds; that the people must be taxed to support two lines instead of one. Finally they recommend, what would increase the very evils they point out, as the only remedy to the people, to build more rival lines in the shape of canals and improving water ways, while they know the Pacific road, which the Government controls, is allowed to buy up the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by paying over a million dollars yearly to the Pacific Mail line to prevent the very competition the committee desire by expending millions on canals and rivers.

A remarkable position indeed. I would cheerfully vote millions to dig canals and clean rivers if I could be assured we had a government that could protect the people and prevent creature corporations of its own creation from stealing millions from the pockets of the people to deny them access to two oceans which require no digging or dredging for commerce.

The bill denounces discrimination against persons or places, against more for a short than long haul. Now if we add limiting the dividends to the actual cost of roads, and then that for any claim for damages to the person or penalties to the public the corporation may be prosecuted in the State courts and be prohibited from removing such suits to federal courts, then a fair beginning will have been made.

The people will never be relieved of these evils if we are content to sit down before them and lament they are too large to handle.

AN EXAMPLE FOR THE NATION.

The nation can take an example from Jay Gould. The Senate Committee on Education and Labor industriously obtained from that worthy individual a complete history of his life, presumably for the youth of America to imitate. If this Republic had as much persistence in right as a single individual had in wrong the remedy would soon be effected; neither courts, Legislatures, nor law stood in his way. It seems the courts, the law, Legislatures, Congress, and the people can not rend the spoiler of his prey or obtain relief against his villainies.

That biography is an amusing chapter in the testimony referred to. The committee tremblingly and beseechingly implored him to give a minute detail of his daring exploits and wonderful life, and he most blushingly consented. Early in life, when he was hard pressed for dinner, he adopted, he says, his sister's method, and went behind the blacksmith-shop and prayed. Only one prayer was necessary, for the blessing came in great measure; so much so that in a few years the tanning business in which he and his partner were engaged was in financial stress and peril so overwhelming that the partner was driven to suicide, and Gould, the other distressed partner, at once bought a railroad nearly 100 miles in length. For the prosperity of the country the wrong partner suicided.

Still the Committee on Education and Labor delicately forced the blushing Gould to proceed with stories rivaling Aladdin's lamp, he omitting the millions stolen from Erie during his lively management, and the dark shadows that lowered on Black Friday when he could not gloat over the financial disaster of a great Republic, although thousands were ruined, but was voluble as to Union Pacific. How the innocent, guileless creature was inveigled into purchasing the stock, and when he was really forced into the ownership that his only ambition was to put that enterprise on a substantial foundation, and to accomplish that immediately pumped so much water into the concern that he succeeded admirably in placing it on a foundation so liquid that its weight submerged it from the hopes and almost the sight of men.

He bought worthless roads and unloaded them on the Union Pacific at an advance of millions to himself, when he triumphantly and with great emphasis exclaimed that he surprised every one by paying dividends; a most wonderful feat, when it was equally evident to every one that the dividends were never earned. He was only preparing the way to capture the surplus millions of Massachusetts and other New England colonies.

Then the grand achievement of purchasing at a nominal price the bankrupt Kansas Pacific and consolidating with the dividend-paying Union Pacific, whereby he and his pals realized from twelve to fifteen million dollars. Then, as there were no more worlds to conquer, he generously consented that the widows and orphans of Massachusetts should be allowed the golden opportunity, and he unloaded at par and upward, and turned over the wreck to the management of Mr. Adams.

No wonder the Committee on Education were dazed, doubtless as much so as by reading the exploits of Jack the Giant Killer or the life of Kidd the Pirate. The recital was fearfully exciting, but between the long-drawn breath of admiration of the committee they could beg of him to proceed, that the world, as they, were breathlessly waiting to hear still more. When he regained his own breath, after detailing the Union Pacific marvel, he proceeded with the tale of the Missouri Pacific. He gently stated that in this, as all other projects, from the time he prayed behind the blacksmith-shop and his partner committed suicide, he desired to do some great and good thing, and that he obtained the Missouri Pacific, not higgling about the price, but paying the owner his own figure, and, he adds, taking no longer time to make negotiations than in relating it to the committee. Not to make money. Oh, no! But to see what good he could accomplish, and at once with great energy commenced pumping into it water as he did into Union Pacific.

Gould through modesty refrained from telling a portion of what was the current history at the time. At Kansas City he was overtaken with another religious spasm, and he wrestled for the second time in prayer, and told the people how happy he felt; that he wanted no more money; that filthy lucre led to death; that he had purchased the Missouri Pacific only for good to mankind, and should use it only for the glory of God and the benefit of the people.

As he was contemplating another raid, he seemed to feel the necessity of another installment of Divine grace; so he went short on the promise by pretending he would not benefit himself by the blessing.

How well he kept his promise is evinced by cruel treatment and breach of faith to the thousands of employés on the same road in the determination to force them into absolute starvation or abject submission to his demands.

Theologians have never fully understood this feature in the wonderful history. There is no mystery, they say, in the prayer and getting religion behind the blacksmith-shops, but why he should seek a new installment of Divine assistance and reasonably hope to expect it from Kansas City is past finding out.

For the comfort of the present and future residents of the New Jerusalem it is to be hoped he will not indulge in a third prayer on earth, for that might tide him through this life, and should he in the end secure an entrance into the Celestial City he would soon be conspiring there to lay a railroad from force of habit; when he tore up the shining avenues the angels could not restrain him from stealing the golden pavements.

PROTECTION TO LABOR.

To secure by legal and proper methods that protection which is due to labor it is organizing, impelled by the avarice and exactions and power of organized capital; and a portion of the pulpit and press, as usual, are imploring peace and observance of the laws. Certainly labor is not proposing to violate either. To-day it has but little more power to do so than the slave in his chains. His advancement is through peace, his protection through the law.

Such appeals are always made to the weak; they were made to the slave. The sacredness of the law and the sanctions of religion were duly preached into him even to submitting quietly to chains and stripes. At that time there was no preaching to the slaveholder, as there is to-day but little preaching to the corporation monsters in iniquity. Why not implore them to restore what they have stolen from the nation; to relinquish their unjust demands; to emancipate labor from a despotism as grinding as that which the colored man endured?

The object of the organization of labor is to preserve peace, to obtain concentrated and intelligent action, to obtain redress through the ballot and not the bullet. The strong arms of labor have always protected the nation in the day of peril. There need be no fear to the Republic from that source. Bold, wealthy slavery precipitated the war, but the men from the ranks of toil preserved the life of the Union. I hope not to grate too harshly on Senatorial nerves, and will break the story gently in this solemn presence, that not many of the names of Gould, Vanderbilt, and the millionaires of the money centers appear on the rolls of the Union Army.

The ranks of the Union Army were recruited from those who were delving in our mines, toiling in our factories, filling our prairies with bountiful crops, running our railway trains, and when the nation is again in peril from within or without the brave hearts and strong arms of the same class of laborers will rescue it again.

Far better turn your entreaty to overgrown corporations and beg them to regard the sacredness of law. Go to the Standard Oil Company, which transgresses all law and honor in its methods to crush out smaller industries, conspiring with great railroad corporations, who seek to set at defiance the statutes and the courts.

So the money-lenders, who seek to violate and nullify the Constitution and law which make silver and gold a legal tender, by requiring in their contracts notes and mortgages to be paid in gold alone.

These are the great criminals, who would imperil the prosperity of the nation to feed their own greed. Yet Congress is paralyzed, not so much by the great transgressions as the giant wrongdoers, with whom they fear to grapple.

The wealth of this nation is made alone by the toiling hands. The power of this nation is alone in the ballots in the same toiling hands. And to make that wealth, abstracted into the pockets of the few, subservient to the prosperity of the nation the ballot must represent the men who hold it and not their enemies.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate briefly in explanation of what I believe to be the principles involved in the bill under consideration.

This bill purports to be an act to regulate commerce between the different States. I have read it with a good deal of care and I do not find anything in it that regulates commerce. Everything in it is as to the carrier only. The word commerce has a well-defined meaning. It means trade, barter, interchange of commodities, with which the carrier in the transaction of his legitimate business has no concern whatever. I therefore think the title of the bill ought to be changed to express its true meaning, and, instead of reading "A bill to regulate commerce," it should be "A bill to regulate carriers."

If it were a bill to regulate shippers and owners, whose material the carrier moves, the title would be more appropriate. I may be told perhaps that there are judicial decisions that the regulation of the carrier is the regulation of commerce, but here when we propose legislation it is entirely legitimate to discuss the question as to the original matter and to determine it upon the principles which seem to be involved. There is a great difference between the possession of a power and its exercise.

Of course the Constitution plainly gives Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States. But as the carrier has nothing to do with the control of the shipment of goods, wares, and merchandise, with their ultimate disposal or destination, therefore regulating him or determining the price he may receive for his services can have no relation in determining the commerce between States. As a national question why should the price fixed for carrying freight across a non-physical line between the States be different from what is charged for the same service on either side of that line? Would it not be making of our State lines more or less obstacles to free intercourse? Would it not be converting every State line into something very nearly akin to a frontier? What do my friends say who have been always so anxious to claim that we are of right one great family with free business intercourse between ourselves, and what do my State rights friends say to the General Government interfering and controlling their local institutions?

It has been said that the right to regulate the railroad carrier is peculiar, in that the corporation operating the railroad is the creature of the State.

If there is anything in this argument it can not apply here in Congress, as Congress has had nothing whatever to do with creating the corporation. Its existence is entirely by virtue of State laws and has under those laws the right only to operate within the jurisdiction of the State. Of course I except some Pacific roads.

It is pertinent for us to inquire into the wisdom of this kind of legislation, assuming that the authority for it exists. The right of association is a natural one and it is the duty of the National and State Legislatures to aid that natural right, and that I contend is what legislation by the various States providing for the incorporation of railroad companies has done. The incorporation is made by individual incorporators as much so as a partnership between individuals is established by the partners themselves. The character of railroad investment as compared with others is set forth by the fact that States can and do exercise the right of eminent domain in order that railroads may be constructed.

The State can not exercise this right for the benefit of the railroads. It only exercises it because the investment is of that peculiarly beneficial character to the public that it may be said to be a public good. The rule is, moreover, that the railroad companies must pay individuals deprived of the control of their property under the right of eminent domain whatever may be the value of that property. The State pays nothing.

Now, then, if the investment in railroads is so beneficial to the public, why should not the investors be permitted to reap the same full rewards of the wisdom of their investment and of their industry and the management and direction thereof as though the same capital, the same wisdom, and the same industry had been employed in a business so much less important to the interests of the State that the State could not, if solicited, exercise the right of eminent domain in its behalf?

In discussing this question of the right to regulate railroad fares and freights in a manner which will necessarily impair the earning capacity of these roads we should not forget that the investments were made by individuals. If the railroads are so important to the public, surely these individual investors ought not to be discouraged by the apprehension that the value of their investment may be lessened by adverse legislation.

Furthermore, inasmuch as labor enters very largely in the construction of railroads and continues in their operation, any attempt on the part of Congress to fix the rates of railroad companies tends to fix the price of labor.

Further, in all these efforts at regulation I find no protection to the railroad companies, no guarantee against impairment of income. Therefore if legislation interferes to decrease income, surely the value of the property is affected to the extent of the diminution of the income. This is taking property without compensation. It is confiscation.

I think there never has been a bill introduced into any Legislature purporting to regulate railroads against which the owners of the roads did not find occasion to protest on the ground that it diminished the income-producing quality of their property.

Now, then, the investment being a legitimate one and a desirable one, as is established by the exercise of eminent domain not in behalf of the railroad company, for the State has no right to do that, but in behalf of the people, and the State being justified in regarding railroads as public benefits, why should they after their completion have less protection from the laws than other property, or why should they be made the objects of direct and injurious legislation? And in this connection I think it proper to remark that railroads have no legal monopoly of business, since they have no exclusive privileges.

Practically this bill denies to the various railroad companies the right of competition. It precludes the shippers from reaping their rightful advantage of competition, and causes to them and to the railroad companies absolute loss. If the low rates for the long distance mean a reduction for the shorter, the carrier must submit to a loss from the usual rates on the shorter distance, or else abandon the business at the competing points.

Under the force of competition the carriers are often compelled to take business over their roads long distances at a lower rate than they receive for shorter distances. No railroad company would do this if the rate to be charged was a matter under its control.

For this reason rates are oftentimes below the average cost of transportation, and freight of a low value in the market is often moved at less than average cost. Low rates, if they pay anything above the direct expenses consequent upon movement, aid to sustain the railroads and the better enable them to move the traffic at non-competing points. Railroad companies can not ignore the various circumstances that establish competition, much of which depends on the geographical condition of the country. The shipper for a short distance is not charged more, but the shipper for a long distance is charged less because the carriers can not help themselves.

All will admit that no legitimate enterprises should be discouraged, particularly those that add most to the convenience and comfort of the people, and to the wealth, strength, and dignity of the nation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the committee which has reported the present bill to the Senate has performed a very important service to the country. They have at great labor investigated the question of transportation in its different bearings; they have traveled over different parts of the country, honestly seeking after the truth and striving to learn the experience of those engaged in transportation, as well as those engaged in production or trade. They have heard evidence in different States from men of a high order of ability and long experience, and they have grouped together many facts that are most important for the guidance of future legislators in their efforts to promote the public interest. The chairman of the committee has been indefatigable in his exertions to produce something that would be of lasting benefit to the community. He has shown himself to be conservative, laborious, and wise.

There are, however, a few points in the bill presented by the committee which I do not think if they should become law will operate beneficially to the great interest involved, or that the working of some one or two of them at least will be satisfactory to the railroad companies, the commercial interests, or the great producing interests of the country. I shall now address myself to the objections which occur to my mind to the parts of the bill to which I will proceed to call attention, in the hope that the committee will consent to such amendments as may modify, if not overcome, the objections which seem to lie against the practicability and wisdom of that part of their production. In section 4, on page 4 of the bill, I find the following language:

> That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, for a shorter than for a longer distance, over the same line in the same direction and from the same original point of departure.

There is a proviso that, upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may in special cases be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time make general rules covering exceptions to any such common carrier in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, and exempt such designated common carrier in such special cases from the operation of this section of this act.

In section 1 it is provided that the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used for a continuous carriage or shipment from one State or Territory of the United States to any other State or Territory of the United States, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country or other place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, &c.

Section 5 provides that in cases where passengers and freight traffic pass over lines or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates, or fares, or charges, it shall be deemed a compliance with the requirements of this act in respect to the filing of such tariffs if copies of such joint tariffs shall be filed by any one of said common carriers, &c.

Section 6 provides that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, expressed or implied, to prevent by change of time schedule carriage in different cars, or by other means or devices, the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, and no break of bulk, stoppage, or interruption made by such common carrier shall prevent the carriage of freights from being and being treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such break, stoppage, or interruption was in good faith for some necessary purpose, and without any intent to avoid or unnecessarily interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

It seems to my mind very clear that the intention of this act is to make each line of railroad or of railroad and water transportation, where the water transportation makes part of the line between any two points where a through bill of lading is given from one to the other, a continuous line, subject to all the provisions of the act. Take, for instance, the railroad connections from Philadelphia to Chicago. A through bill of lading is given over a continuous line between said cities, and bear in mind this law knows no State line, but the whole is treated as one transportation between the point of shipment and the point of destination. Here the freight is shipped from Chicago to Philadelphia upon a bill of lading and the rate is 50 cents per hundred pounds between the two cities. Now, I understand it is contended that the Pennsylvania Railroad can charge 50 cents per hundred pounds from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, being the same rate charged from Chicago to Philadelphia, because the freight passes all the way from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia in the State of Pennsylvania and over the Pennsylvania Railroad, and that it is therefore no violation of the act to charge as much from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia as from Chicago to Philadelphia.

I confess I can not quite understand how this can be done without a violation of the act, which forbids the charging of a less rate for a longer than for a shorter distance. If the bill when properly construed means that, the rate being 50 cents per hundred pounds from Chicago to Philadelphia, the Pennsylvania Railroad may charge 50 cents from a station 20 miles from Philadelphia to the latter place, then I do not see how the passage of this provision of the bill into a law remedies complaints of inequality in rates, or how such a law could be claimed to be equitable and just; and if the construction mentioned be the true one—that you may charge as much between any two stations on the line as you charge for the whole length of the line—then the bill would legalize greater inequality than any that is now practiced by the railroads against which the greatest complaint is made.

But in this connection I desire also to refer to and comment upon the amendment of the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], which is not doubtful as to its meaning. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance which includes the shorter distance on any one railroad, and the railroad of a corporation shall include all the railroad in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease.

Now it is very obvious that the honorable Senator intends, as his argument shows, that the rate per mile shall be the same without regard to distances. In other words, that the company should not receive a less compensation for carrying freight a hundred miles than it receives for carrying it 90 miles over the same line of road.

Now, Mr. President, with the provision of the bill to which I have referred, and especially with the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, enacted into a law and strictly carried out, it is impossible for the railroads of this country to transact the business of the country. If they attempt it they will either be driven into bankruptcy or a large part of the best territory of the United States will be driven from market and be unable to reach either Eastern cities or foreign markets with their produce. In other words, the railroads must put their local freights so low that they can not pay fixed expenses and run, or they must put the through business at so high a figure as to prohibit the shipment of produce for a longer distance than five or six hundred miles.

I discussed this question at some length on a former occasion, and I shall make no apology to the Senate for reproducing substantially part of what I then said, as I think it has a direct bearing upon the question now before the Senate.

The constant cry is that the railroads are oppressing the people—that they are great monopolies growing rich by their oppression. The fact is that a very large proportion of them have gone, and are going, into bankruptcy, and those who are weak enough to put their capital in them are losing the amount invested on account of the clamor of the populace for the control and use of the railroads without anything like just compensation to the owners.

But great stress is put by the advocates of stronger measures of reform upon the fact that railroad companies often carry through freights longer distances for less money than they carry local freights for shorter distances. That practice is vehemently condemned by the advocates of virtual confiscation of railroad property. If we should pass the interstate-commerce bill and should prevent that practice, the people, when they saw the workings of it, would very soon be clamorous for the repeal of the obnoxious law. You must permit through freights to be carried longer distance for less money than local freights are carried shorter distances, or you exclude through freights from your lines of road entirely, and then the railroad companies must fall back upon their home productions and make their money, if they make any, out of local freights. The same rate of freight per mile will not do.

Let me illustrate. Suppose a farmer brings 10 tons of corn to the railroad depot at Marietta, 20 miles from Atlanta, which he desires transported to Atlanta. The railroad company takes charge of it, receives the corn into the depot, the employés take the trucks, roll it to the car, and load it in at Marietta; then the company hauls it to Atlanta, takes the trucks, runs it out, unloads it, and delivers it to the consignees. What would be a reasonable charge for the transportation? Would any reasonable man object to $5 for carrying the 10 tons of corn 20 miles? I presume not. It would be less than a cent and a half a bushel. It would be 2½ cents per ton per mile. None can question that the freight for so short a distance is reasonable.

Now, suppose another farmer brings 10 tons of corn and delivers it at the depot of the same road at Dalton, 100 miles from Atlanta. It must be carried at the same rate per mile from Dalton to Atlanta at which it was carried from Marietta to Atlanta, which is 2½ cents per ton per mile. This would make a car-load of 10 tons cost the shipper $25 between Dalton and Atlanta.

Now, suppose another farmer in Kansas City, Mo., delivers 10 tons of corn to the railroad to be shipped to Atlanta. The same rate per ton per mile must be charged for the longer distance which is charged for the shorter distance. What would be the freight between Kansas City and Atlanta, which is in round numbers a thousand miles? It would be $250 on a car-load of 10 tons or 350 bushels. This would be a fraction over 71 cents per bushel freight from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta. What say the Western planters to this rule as applied to the transportation of their produce to market, and what say the cotton-planters of Georgia to the application of the rule as applied to the production of the West which they purchase for home consumption? No one will complain that the rate charged between Marietta and Atlanta in the case supposed is unreasonable, and yet if we apply the same rule to freights for longer distances it soon reaches a point where it amounts to a prohibition to carry it at all. In the case supposed the freight on a bushel of corn between Kansas City, Mo., and Atlanta, Ga., would be more than the corn would bring in either market. The rule which produces this sort of inconvenience, this sort of absurdity and injustice, can not be a wholesome or wise rule.

But other patriotic persons engaged in the regulation of interstate commerce will disavow this rule, and will declare that it is not their purpose to require the same rate of freight per mile on local and through shipments, but that they only intend to prevent the carrying of the same quantity and quality of through freight a longer distance for less money than is charged on the same line for a like quantity and quality of local freights for a shorter distance. On first presentation the reasonableness and equity of this rule seem to be apparent, but when we apply to it the test of practical experience it will not bear examination, and its absurdity becomes obvious.

As already stated, a large majority of the railroad companies who have built the railroads in this country have gone into bankruptcy, and the railroads when sold have been purchased at prices greatly below the cost of construction by companies which have consolidated them into a few long trunk lines, which now run in competition with each other, and which have become necessary in conducting the business of transportation. And many of them purchased at prices far below cost do not pay dividends upon the purchase price.

As long as competition can be maintained without ending in consolidation competition seems to be conducive to public prosperity, but if you apply the rule that railroads shall in no case carry freights of like quantity and quality a longer distance for less money than they carry similar freights a shorter distance, you will soon check and destroy a great deal of the competition which now exists.

The position amounts to this: that a car-load of corn when conveyed as through freight shall not be carried 25 miles for less money than a like car-load of corn conveyed as local freight is required to pay for 20 miles. Now, if you will fix a reasonable rate of local freight for 20 miles, such as will enable any railroad company to pay even the fixed expense of keeping its road in repair and running it, and you will then fix a through rate for the same car-load for 25 miles at the same rate charged for 20 miles of local transportation and extend that rate to 1,000 miles, you will find in every instance that the rate of freight will amount to a prohibition, and you can not transport the goods and pay the rate. To maintain the rule you must either fix the local rate below the point absolutely necessary to pay the running expenses or you must fix the through rate so high it will prohibit the transportation of the commodity.

Take the case already supposed of a car-load of corn shipped from

Marietta to Atlanta, charging a local rate of $5 per car-load for 20 miles. Then suppose a through shipment over the same road at a rate that would carry the car-load of corn 25 miles for $4. This would be a violation of the proposed legislation, as it would be a case where a like commodity is shipped a longer distance for less money. Or if you discriminate even more than this between local and through freight, carrying the through freight a still greater distance for less money than you carry the local, unless you extend it very materially it will amount to a prohibition, and you can not ship through freight at all.

In the case supposed we carry a car-load of local freight for 20 miles for $5 and a car-load of through freight 25 miles for $4. For 100 miles this would be $16, and from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta, 1,000 miles, it would be $160 for transporting a car-load of 350 bushels of corn. This would be about 45 cents a bushel on the corn for freight. What say the farmers of Missouri and Kansas? Would their corn bear this freight? Clearly not. A great deal of corn is now shipped from Kansas City into Georgia. Such a law would at once prohibit further shipments of corn for so long a distance.

But to meet the objection of the hypercritical as to rates, let us suppose the case that the local rate on a car-load of corn from Marietta to Atlanta, 20 miles, is only two dollars and a half—and no railroad can keep long out of the insolvent court which carries its local freights as low as that; then suppose the rate on a car-load of through freight between Kansas City and Atlanta should be $2 for every 25 miles. This again would violate the law if the proposed legislation should be enacted. The car-load of corn carried as local freight from Atlanta to Marietta being charged two dollars and a half for 20 miles, and the car-load of through freight being charged only $2 for 25 miles, we would be carrying the same commodity a longer distance for less money; but even the low rate of two dollars and a half per car-load for 20 miles of local freight would, when we apply the rule to through freight, be prohibitory. If we charge $2 for 25 miles on a car of through freight, this would be $8 per hundred miles and $80 for a thousand miles. This would be a fraction over 22 cents a bushel freight on corn from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta.

Now, if we may credit the newspapers, I believe a bushel of corn is worth but little more than that in Kansas City at the present time. Even at this ruinously low rate of local freight (which no railroad company can afford to charge and continue to do business) the rule applied to through freight makes it prohibitory before it reaches a thousand miles distance. It would probably be prohibitory in the case supposed at 500 miles or less distance.

If you enact such a law as this you will derange the whole transportation of the country, and you will either drive the railroads generally into bankruptcy on account of the low rate you permit them to charge for their local freights, upon which they rely mainly for their support, or you will prohibit the interchange of commodities at a greater distance than five or six hundred miles. As the figures plainly show, it could not possibly stand the rate for a thousand miles.

Under such a rate of freight how would the farmers of the teeming West ever reach European markets with their productions? It would be simply an impossibility.

Such a law would destroy not only the interstate commerce of the country, but utterly ruin our foreign commerce by prohibiting the exportation of our productions to foreign markets. I take it that wise men will not be guilty of enacting into a law a proposition so manifestly absurd.

Some of the Southern lines of railroad and steamships are trying to build up competition with the Northern roads for the Western business.

For a long time the Northern roads have had a monopoly of that business. They run four trunk lines, as you are aware, from the Eastern cities into the great West—the Baltimore and Ohio, the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the New York Central. These are the four great trunk lines that penetrate the West in every direction, going to Chicago, Saint Louis, and other central points in that section, and they do the business between the East and the West.

They frequently, while at war with each other, carry freights for almost nominal prices from the West through to New York, and thence by steamer to Charleston and Savannah. Then they load their steamers with cotton and other productions back to New York, and load their cars in New York with Western-bound freights. Now that freight landed in Savannah by the steamers from New York can be taken and carried to Louisville, Ky., at a very low rate, and the railroads still make money on it.

This shows the feasibility of opening another great trunk line between New York and the other Eastern cities and the great West. In prorating freights railroad men count 1 mile of rail equal to 3 miles of water. Why so? The company has to secure the right of way, grade the road, lay down the track and prepare it for the cars, which is a heavy expense for each mile.

God has prepared the ocean, and it is ready to receive the burden of transportation without the construction of a track, and all man has to do is to put on the rolling-stock—in other words, build the ship—and the road is already prepared for use.

It is very evident, therefore, that freight can be transported 3 miles by water as cheaply as it can be carried 1 mile by rail. Now we have a splendid line of steamers running between New York and Savannah, which make their trips with great regularity and carry passengers and cargoes of freight. Then we have a line of railroad from Savannah through to Louisville, Ky., connecting at different points with other roads penetrating the West and reaching Saint Louis, Chicago, and Kansas City, and other commercial centers. Now apply the prorating rule to the portion of the distance which includes conveyance by water, and counting 3 miles of water for 1 of rail, and the line from New York to Louisville is shorter by way of Savannah than by any one of the four great Western trunk lines from New York to Louisville. The same is true as to Memphis, Saint Louis, Kansas City, and in fact to all cities of any importance west of Cincinnati and Chicago.

There is an immense section of the West which should have the benefit of a competing line between that section and the Eastern cities, which is the shortest of the five competitors. Then it has this additional advantage so far as the transportation of freight from the East to the West is concerned: Of the immense number of trains which run from the West into Georgia and the South Atlantic States to supply the cotton planters with Western productions, seven out of every ten of the cars go back empty when they return to the West for another load. Now, a cargo of goods in New York intended for Saint Louis has the advantage of the shortest line by Savannah; it has the advantage of transportation by ocean from New York to Savannah, and of transportation from Savannah to Saint Louis in cars that would otherwise go back empty.

There are four links, composed of different companies, in the line of rail between Savannah and Saint Louis. Now, suppose each of these receives but $5 on a car-load of goods going from New York to Saint Louis, it makes money on the shipment, because the car would go empty if it were not permitted to carry the goods.

It is nearly 300 miles from Savannah to Atlanta. Suppose the Central road receives but $5 for the car-load for that distance. As the car was going back empty, it is $5 made. But if you lay down the rule that the Central shall charge $5 a car only for carrying the local freight 300 miles, it ceases to be able to pay fixed expenses and goes into bankruptcy in a single year.

Therefore you can not reduce the rate of local freight on the Central to $5 a car; but if the Central undertakes to carry a car-load of goods in transit between New York and Saint Louis from Savannah to Atlanta for $5, when the car would otherwise go empty, you prohibit it, by establishing the rule that no company shall carry on its own road the same freight for a longer distance for less money than like freight is carried for a shorter distance, and the Central is excluded from carrying this freight at all. The people of the West are deprived of the competition while it lasts of a fifth great line between them and the Eastern cities, and deprived of a cheaper rate of freight which they could secure by the shipment over the line referred to.

Now, what good, let me ask, does it do any one, except the great trunk lines, to prohibit the opening and operating of a fifth great line between the East and the West?

And what good does it do any one but trunk lines to drive this freight around upon the trunk lines by establishing the rule that you can not carry the like freight a longer distance for less money? In this case you must carry this great through business a longer distance for less money than you carry local freights a shorter distance, or you must prohibit the use of the line for the purpose of carrying through freights.

But you may say it is unjust to the people of Georgia to permit this through business going from New York to Saint Louis to pass over the railroads in Georgia a longer distance at less rates than they pay for the shorter distance. What harm, let me ask, does this do any citizen of Georgia?

The freight goes to Savannah by steamer; it is loaded on a car that would otherwise go empty to Saint Louis, and it passes rapidly over the soil of Georgia, doing nobody any harm but really doing a service to the people of Georgia. But you may ask how? I reply that the railroads of Georgia must make out of some business money enough to keep them in good condition and run them for the benefit of the community, to say nothing of the justice of paying dividends to their stockholders.

Now if we can not conduct through business over these lines as cheaply as it is done in other sections, or can not be permitted to compete with other long lines for the business, then we must levy the amount that we would make on through freight as an additional charge on the local business.

In other words, each $1,000 that the through line makes in carrying return freights on cars that would otherwise go empty is that much that goes into the support of the railroads forming the line, and that much which must be levied upon the local business, if we are not permitted to collect it on this class of through business.

What good sense, let me ask, what sound policy, what statesmanship, would justify the exclusion of this freight from the soil of Georgia, driving it around on some other line, because it must pass through the State, if at all, on account of the great distance it has to travel, at a lower rate than we can charge for local freights and continue to live? These freights between New York and Saint Louis must go over some line.

What injury does it do any man, woman, or child in Georgia for it to pass on a Western and Atlantic Green Line car loaded in Savannah across the soil of the State to Saint Louis, which car would otherwise go back empty? None possibly that I can perceive.

If the freight does not go in a car that would otherwise go empty over the line between Savannah and Saint Louis it will go in a car that runs between New York and Saint Louis over one of the trunk lines. If it goes in a car over our Southern line that would otherwise go back empty, and we make $5 for each company on it, it is that much clear profit to the people of Georgia. Then why should it be prohibited?

But you may say that an act of Congress prohibiting transportation of that character will apply as well to the other trunk lines. True; and if so, then it would disturb the whole through business between Eastern cities and the West, and the people would be clamorous for its repeal as soon as they saw the mischievous and injurious impediments which the rule throws in the way of the business of the country.

But it may be said in the case supposed, in carrying the through freight from New York to Saint Louis over the Central road of Georgia, if the company carries it from Savannah to Atlanta for $5, in its transit across the territory the company should not charge more than $5 if the consignee should require it to be taken off the train and delivered at Jonesborough, 20 miles before reaching Atlanta.

In other words, that car-load of the same character of freight going from New York to Jonesborough, Ga., should only be charged $5 if the company carries a like car-load of through freight consigned to Saint Louis from Savannah to Atlanta, which is 20 miles farther, for $5. In the one case the freight shipped from New York by steamer to Savannah and then shipped by the Central road from Savannah to Jonesborough would be local freight, so far as the Central road is concerned; and if the Central road should be required to transport like freight by car-load from Savannah to Jonesborough and to put all its local freights at the same rate, its income would not pay one-half of the fixed expense of maintaining and running the road, and bankruptcy would follow.

Then no reasonable man would insist that the Central road should be required to put its local freight at $5 a car-load between Savannah and Jonesborough, as all must admit that the railroad could not run and charge such rates. In the other case, the through consignment from New York to Saint Louis reaches Savannah by steamer, and it is put upon a car that is going by the next train from Savannah to Saint Louis for a load of bacon. The car is going empty, as the company has no freight with which to load it. By receiving the consignment from New York to Saint Louis on board the car and charging $5 for transporting it to Atlanta and delivering it to the Western and Atlantic road the company makes $5 clear money, which goes into its general income for its support, and of course charges $5 less on account of local freights. Where is the injustice? Where is the wrong?

But, says the objector, if the company only charges $5 on the through freight from Savannah to Atlanta, 300 miles, it should not be permitted to charge more than $5 on a car-load of local freight from Savannah to Jonesborough, 20 miles less distance. Why not? It actually costs the company more to deliver it at Jonesborough than at Atlanta.

You may ask me how? I reply that a car-load of through freight hitched on by the Central at Savannah to a train going to Atlanta is carried through without any necessary stoppage at Jonesborough, and when it reaches Atlanta it is simply uncoupled from the Central train and is coupled to a Western and Atlantic train, which takes it in charge and carries it to Chattanooga, and there delivers it to the Nashville, Chattanooga and Saint Louis Railroad. The transfer is made by the simple operation of uncoupling it from one train and coupling it to the other, and the Central road in that case has no delay or stoppage at Jonesborough, and no trouble or expense of switching off the car and delivering the freight; but if it is required to deliver the freight at Jonesborough instead of Atlanta, the train must be stopped at Jonesborough and the car must be switched off from the track to a side track, causing several minutes' delay and consequent expense; for every minute of time lost by a train costs something in the salaries of persons managing the train, in the fuel consumed, in the engine, and other necessary expense. Then the agent at Jonesborough must take the car in hand, and unload the freight upon a platform, place it in the depot, and roll it out again, and deliver it to the consignee when it is called for.

In the case supposed it actually costs the Central Railway decidedly more to deliver the car at Jonesborough than it would to run the train through to Atlanta, uncouple the car, and turn it over to the Western and Atlantic, which couples it to its train and carries it along. But the more important point is that the Central can not maintain itself and put its local freights as low as $5 a car-load from Savannah to Jonesborough, and it must break down and go into the hands of a receiver if it attempts it, while in the case supposed it can take the car-load of through freight consigned to Saint Louis in a car that would otherwise go empty from Savannah to Atlanta and carry it for $5 and make money on it, and all the money it makes by carrying freight of that character goes to aid in supporting the road and paying its expenses, and to that extent lightens the burdens which have to be put upon local freights for its support.

No citizen of Georgia is injured in the slightest particular by the action of the Central Railroad in loading the Saint Louis freight into the car that would otherwise go empty, and transporting it across the territory of the State; while, on the other hand, every citizen who is a patron of the Central Railroad, and has to pay local freights upon it, is to that extent relieved, as his local freights can to that extent be placed at a lower rate. While, therefore, the rule that you shall not carry the same quality and quantity of through freights a longer distance for less money than you carry the like quality and quantity of local freight for a shorter distance is plausible, and appears to be right in itself, all railroad experience shows it to be impracticable, seriously disturbing the operations of through transportation, and to be highly detrimental to the commerce of the country.

No railroad company can continue to run long unless it is permitted to make its fixed expenses, and if it is limited to fixed expenses it can pay no dividends nor can it pay interest upon the capital invested. By the fixed expenses I mean all the expenditure necessary to the purchase of cross-ties, new rails when those upon the track are being too much worn, to keep the bridges and culverts and everything pertaining to the track in good order, to purchase a sufficient number of engines and cars to transact the business of the road, to keep them in good repair and replace them with new ones when worn out.

This includes the expense that every railroad company has to incur in its repair shops, where a large number of machinists and mechanics are necessary to keep the engines and cars in good running order. Fixed expense also includes the salaries or compensation paid train hands, conductors, engine-runners, firemen, track-hands, flagmen, &c. It also includes the salaries of all the officers and agents connected with the company. All these expenses are necessary to keep the road in good running order, so that it can serve the public, and unless the company is permitted to make an amount large enough to cover all these expenses it can not be said to pay fixed expense, and any company that fails to pay the fixed expenses must of course soon go into the hands of a receiver, or it must let the road run down until it becomes too much dilapidated and too dangerous to serve the country longer by the transportation of freight and passengers.

But if you establish the rule that railroad companies shall only be permitted to collect enough for the transportation of freights and passengers to pay fixed expenses, you confiscate the capital invested in the enterprise to the public use without any compensation, as the railroad company that can pay no more than its fixed expenses neither pays interest upon the capital invested in the enterprise nor does it pay any dividends to the stockholders.

Every railroad which is built with the consent of the State under a charter given by the State for transportation in a particular section of country where it has been honestly built and the stock not watered (and I do not justify speculation by watering stock) should be permitted to charge enough to pay all fixed expenses and to pay a reasonable amount as dividends to the stockholders, or to pay interest with a reasonable sinking fund, so as to extinguish the debt of the company within a reasonable time. I presume few men will deny that every railroad company ought to be permitted to charge enough to meet the expenses of the company and to pay reasonable interest or dividends on the capital invested.

Under the present practice, where the Legislatures, the courts and juries, and the public, and indeed everybody, are in favor of robbing railroads or treating them as public enemies, much the larger proportion of them have gone into bankruptcy, or have found themselves wholly unable to pay the interest on their debt or to pay any reasonable dividends to the stockholders. I do not know half a dozen railroads in the whole Southern country from Washington to the Mississippi River and from the Atlantic to the Ohio River that are paying dividends to the stockholders on the original cost of constructing the road. Then there is no encouragement to capitalists for the future to put their money into the construction of new railroads, and as long as there is a general dispositions to make war upon them men of sense will decline to invest more money in railroad stocks or in the construction of railroads.

Some of the leading European governments have grappled with this question years since and have, after long experience, condemned the very proposition contained in the fourth section of this act and the amendment. They have found that it will not work in practice, that they are obliged to permit freights and passengers on many occasions to be transported a greater distance for less money. If a railroad company is to pay fixed expenses and dividends to the stock-holders, it must clear the money necessary to meet such expenses either out of local freights or through freights or both.

Experience has shown in such case that the best that can be done is to fix the local freights at reasonable rates, with a view to meeting the necessary expenses of the company, and then rather than exclude through freights for long distances, and rather than have part of their employés and rolling-stock idle for a portion of the time, it has been found better to carry through freights in competition with other lines long distances at rates which are many times but little more than the actual cost of transportation. If it exceeds the cost of transportation a small amount is made by the company, which aids it in meeting its necessary expenses and relieves local freight from that much additional charges.

Probably not more than one-tenth of the freight carried is through freight over some of the long competing lines. The company can not afford to carry the other nine-tenths of its freight at the rates charged for the through freight, as it can not do so and pay necessary expenses, and if it is prohibited from carrying one-tenth or more of its freights long distances in competition with long through lines, it prevents those who are located far in the interior from reaching coast cities at all with their produce, and takes away from the company the small amount of clear money it realizes on such freights.

As already stated, experience has shown in foreign governments that it is unwise to restrict railroads within the limits prescribed by the proposed legislation.

Mr. E. B. Stahlman, one of the vice-presidents of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, who appeared before the House committee and discussed this great question, made an argument so able and interesting that I shall make no apology for making quotations from it, as I can produce nothing better, and I have heard nothing better produced in the Senate.

Mr. Stahlman had looked into the action of the English, French, and German Governments upon this very question, and I quote from his speech.

He first refers to Great Britain, and says:

In 1865 a royal commission, created to consider the entire railway question, in an elaborate report made in 1867, said:

"Inequality of charge in respect of distance, besides being a necessary consequence of competition, is an essential element in the carrying trade; that is to say, the principle which governs the railway company in fixing the rate is that of creating a traffic by charging such a sum for conveyance as will induce the product of one district to compete with another in the same market. The power of granting special rates thus permits a development of trade which would not otherwise exist; and it is abundantly evident," continues this able commission, "that a large portion of the trade of the country at the present time has been created by and is continued on the faith of special rates. The conditions under which such rates are granted are so numerous that no special law could be framed to meet them."

In 1872 another commission was appointed upon the much vexed question of special rates, and after concluding that the enforcement of equal rates was "impracticable and inexpedient," says:

"It would prevent railway companies from lowering their rates so as to compete with traffic by sea, by canal, or by a shorter or otherwise cheaper railway, and would thus deprive the public of the benefits of competition and the company of a legitimate source of profit. It would prevent railway companies from making perfectly fair arrangement for carrying at a lower rate than usual goods bought in large and constant quantities, or for carrying for long distances at lower rates than for short distances."

In introducing the bill based upon this report to the house of commons, the Right Hon. Chichester Fortesque, chairman, said:

"There was the question whether the unlimited power of varying their charges to the public which the railway companies now use (note this, notwithstanding former legislation) certainly with great freedom and in a manner which led to complaint and sometimes to suspicion ought not to be limited, and whether the system of equal mileage rates exactly according to distance should not be imposed upon the companies. They were carefully considered, and in all these cases the committee came to the conclusion unanimously that they were not conditions which it were either practicable or for the public interest to impose on railway companies."

Let us now look to France. M. de la Gournerie, inspector-general of the French corps of bridges and highways, in a report published in 1879, says:

"In spite of some peculiar circumstances the operation of railroads, like all other industries, is subject to the great law of economics. * * * The prices should be regulated according to the value of the transportation, as determined by the action of supply and demand, and when different bases are adopted, such as the length of haul or the amount of cost, we are led into contradiction and impossibilities."

Again:

"A railroad in its own interest, and in that of the country, ought not to neglect any traffic of a kind that will increase its receipts more than its expenses.

"The different units of transportation carried by a company are far from giving equal profits. If, because some of them leave as net profits only a very small part of the receipts, we assume to regulate the tariff so that it shall get only the same proportion of the whole gross receipts, it will not be able to meet the obligations which it has contracted. The certain results of requirements of this kind would be to lead the companies to refuse all shipments in which they could not make a high profit, and consequently to abandon a considerable income, while depriving the country of cheap transportation for a great quantity of merchandise."

The president of the French board of public works, commenting upon higher rates for short haul rather than for long haul, declared:

"These anomalies, so much charged against the railroads, were not, however, a new event in the transportation business. Before the establishment of railroads the carters likewise imposed a higher rate from Paris to Angiers (191 miles) than from Paris to Nantes (246 miles), and we see that over this route the railroad had only followed the old cartage irregularities. The boats on their part formerly took more from Chalon-sur-Saone to Ville-Franche (60 miles) than from Chalon to Lyons (81 miles); more from Lyons to Tarascon (156 miles) than from Lyons to Arles (165 miles)."

Commenting upon this report, M. de la Gournerie says:

"The railroads are under the same conditions as the carters and the boatmen. I do not see how it could be possible to establish that transportation never has a less value for a longer than a shorter distance, or that each separate transportation should not be paid for according to its value.

A good deal is said of uniformity of tariffs, of regulating the rates according to the distance carried, without taking into account the value of the transportation. Good results can be attained only by fixing rates closely in conformity to the value of transportation. If they exceed it, the road is of little utility to the country and yields small receipts. If they are less than it, they are a gift to the community. Except for grave reasons an arrangement contrary to the rules universally admitted in commerce ought not to be adopted. Uniformity of tariff would occasion much greater inconveniences in France than in a smaller country, all parts of which would be under nearly the same economical condition.

Mr. Chairman, if uniformity should occasion inconvenience and hardships in France, what may not be said of the vast continent of America?

Closing this able and exhaustive report, M. de la Gournerie says:

"I had sought to combat this widely spread opinion that in the commercial operations of railroads everything is artificial; that instead of observing, we must invent; that instead of habitually leaving the different interests to react upon each other through supply and demand, it is necessary to be regulated continually. If we were certain that the men who manage railroad business would always have a perfect understanding of these questions, my conclusion would be to leave the matter to them entirely; I think, then, that the state should preserve its powers, watch attentively, but prescribe little."

In referring to Germany, Mr. Stahlman says:

In Germany the same difficulties have been experienced, so that the fixed policy of that empire has been to purchase the lines by just negotiations with their owners with a view thereafter of managing and controlling them.

Prior to this conclusion a royal commission reported upon the whole subject of regulation, from which I quote as follows:

"In the course of forty years of development the enormous importance of railroads for traffic and the entire modern civilization has been shown, so that the legal regulation of the state's supervision over the railroad system is acknowledged to be one of the most difficult problems to solve. It is not yet everywhere understood that an efficient regulation of the state's supervision over the railroad system is impossible for any length of time; that the indirect attention of the state for the public interests concerned is not to be regarded as sufficient means to solve the task of their protection and promotion. The existing order of the railroad system in the different states still presents a queer picture of the most differing systems. A closer study of the important public interests concerned in the railroad system and of the task the state has to fulfill in their protection and promotion will prove that the direct and unlimited attention of the state, the uniting of the property, of the traffic, and of the management of inland main lines, under the strong arm of the state, are the only efficient and proper means to solve that task."

Again, upon the subject of freight tariffs:

The regulation of tariffs moves in a broad margin between the expenses of running the road, which it is difficult and uncertain to determine, and the value of transportation to the stockholders.

A forcible reduction of freight offers, for legitimate regulation, difficulties almost impossible to overcome, without, of course, referring to reductions conditioned by competition or pressing liabilities. A legitimate regulation contains not only a weighty and direct encroachment on the management, but also on the financial affairs of the enterprises concerned.

Mr. Stahlman adds:

Here then, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have the great powers of England, France, and Germany, after years of thoughtful investigation and legislation, rejecting in toto every important provision of the Reagan bill, and yet the distinguished chairman of this committee continues to vigorously press this measure for passage.

But we are told that a greater necessity exists for legislation in America than in Europe.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a few tables, hastily prepared, but correct in the main, and sufficiently full to illustrate what I am about to say. Take the freight tonnage per mile carried, and the comparison stands:

	Tons.
United Kingdom	14,200
France	5,500
Germany	7,100
Belgium	10,200
America	3,280

PASSENGERS.

	Per mile carried.
Great Britain	41,100
France	10,600
Belgium and Holland	19,900
Switzerland	13,750
America	2,860

Passenger tariffs per mile charged, two classes:

	First class.	Second class.	Average.
Great Britain	4.60	3.20	3.90
France	3.84	2.88	3.26
Germany	3.08	2.30	2.69
Russia	3.64	2.72	3.18
Austria	4.60	2.70	3.15
Spain	4.00	3.08	3.54
America	2.76	2.10	2.43

The table of freight earnings I have not been able to make up, but the comparison in freight is even more in favor of American roads than the exhibit in passenger rates, while the total gross and net earnings, including passenger, freight, and miscellaneous receipts, run from 200 to 600 per cent. in excess of the earnings of American roads, and yet we are told there is more need for legislation in this country than in Europe, and that the legislation here should be more rigid.

Take the question of passenger rates alone, compare the two, please, Mr. Chairman, and tell me (when you know, or at least ought to know, that the facilities furnished in America, even in smoking-cars, are equal if not superior to the first-class coaches of European railways), why the people of America should complain of a rate of 2.43 per mile, against a rate of 3.90 in Great Britain, 3.26 in France, 2.69 in Germany, 3.18 in Russia, 3.15 in Austria, and 3.54 in Spain; and this too when the travel in America is only 2,860 passengers per mile against 10,600 in France, 17,900 in Belgium and Holland, 13,750 in Switzerland, and 41,100 in Great Britain.

Now, Mr. President, a few words in reference to the second section of this bill. It provides that if any common carrier shall directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects or receives from another person or persons for doing him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful. And any common carrier who shall violate the provisions of this section as aforesaid shall be liable to all persons who have been charged a higher rate than was charged another person or persons for the difference between such higher rate and the lowest rate charged upon like shipments during the same period, or if such lower rate was made on any time contract or understanding, the said common carrier shall be liable to pay a like rebate or drawback to all other shippers over the same route, between the same points, who have shipped goods during the time that such contract or understanding was in operation.

Now, Mr. President, this is a very strong provision against rebates or drawbacks or special rates. As a general rule, rebates should be prohibited. In other words, all rebates which are intended unjustly to discriminate between two or more persons in the ordinary transaction of their business are highly improper and are seldom ever practiced by a railroad company that has regard for its own interest and the interest of the community. And still there are exceptions in the ordinary transaction of business where it is not only proper but important, where it is not only the interest of the railroad company but the interest of the community, that rebates should be given. In the various transactions which arise in the development of our country and in conducting its great commercial affairs no stubborn iron rule that is inflexible can be applied without working not only injury to the transportation companies but great detriment to the public.

I beg leave to illustrate this by a quotation from the speech of Mr. Stahlman, above referred to, as he has put the case clearly and intelligently, so as to show the hardships which must arise to the community and the transportation companies if an unbending rule, forbidding rebates, should become the law of the land. In illustrating this he takes a very cheap, yet a very important commodity, produced largely in this country, and needed for use in foreign countries, and often shipped there. He illustrates his meaning by the cost of the transportation on staves shipped from the timber regions of the West to the Eastern seacoast and part of them shipped abroad, and on coal shipped from Indiana and Illinois to the States northwest of Chicago.

On page 28 of his argument Mr. Stahlman discusses this question, and I must ask the Clerk to read that portion of it, as I think it very important.

The Secretary read as follows:

The facts with reference to the rebate on staves are about these: Much the largest percentage of the staves shipped in this country find a market at the Eastern seaboard. These staves pay a rate, say, of $70 per car to New York. The shipper of the staves in the West is satisfied with this rate; he does not ask for any concession; the purchasers in the East are content, but the markets of the East are not quite sufficient to consume the quantity the Western shipper produces. He, therefore, looks beyond to see if he may not find a market elsewhere. He finds that he may send staves to England, but can not afford to do so based on a rate of $70 per car to New York. Staves are very low-class traffic; they will not bear shipment by regular steamers to Europe, consequently no through bill of lading can be given from the original point of shipment in the West to Europe. The stave producer must look to sailing vessels or schooners for cheap transportation.

The railroad says to the shipper, "We are willing to make you a concession of $10 per car on shipments to England in competition with staves from Norway. We are perfectly willing to make the concession you or any other shipper who may desire to avail himself of this rate; but inasmuch as no through bills of lading can be given, and the reshipment from New York is made through some New York parties or agency, we are not in a position to know whether the shipment goes through or not. While we are willing to aid you, we can hardly afford to reduce our rates $10 per car on 90 per cent. of our business in order to gain 10 per cent. more on your shipments to England. Therefore, pay us the full rate on all shipments to New York or Boston, and upon presentation of ship's bills of lading showing certain quantities shipped to England we will refund you $10 per car on the quantities thus shipped."

This arrangement is not designed to give one shipper an advantage over another. It is, as I understand it, open to everybody; it is simply designed to prevent a general reduction on 90 per cent. of the business which does not require the concession, and to assure the company that only such shipments as require the concession receive the benefit of them.

The impression that rebates are given to build up one shipper to the injury of another is an entirely erroneous one. The rebates, when given at all, are largely due to just such transactions as I have explained, and frequently to a desire of one railroad company to secure shipments against a competing line. I know that there are institutions which have been favored with rebates, but the committee will find all fair-minded railway managers opposed to such abominable practices; and while on that point I desire to emphatically declare myself for the interest I represent, and railway interests generally, in favor of the most rigid and exacting law, which will prevent rebates for the purpose of unjust discrimination, or to prevent discrimination or extortion in any form whatever. No matter how rigid or exacting the law may be, I am more than satisfied that the railway managers of this country, who are as a rule fair-minded and inclined to do what is right, will most heartily approve of the enactment of such a measure. But there are conditions which necessitate rebates, and when such rebates or drawbacks are given they should be open to all shippers under like circumstances. While the company which I represent is not largely given to such practices, certainly in no case for the purpose of discriminating in favor of one shipper as against another, or for the purpose of robbing a rival line of its legitimate share of business, it does give some rebates, the nature of which I desire briefly to explain.

Take a point on the line of our road, say Franklin, Tenn., for example. A gentleman comes to us and says, "I want to build a grain elevator." The railway company's financial condition does not warrant the railroad in building the elevator, although many Western railroads have done so largely at their own expense. Elevators are nothing more nor less than increased station facilities. We say to the gentleman: "We can not build this elevator, but we will do what we can to aid you. We have the timber on the line of our road required for that purpose. We will carry it for you at the actual cost of transportation. We will not bill it at an open rate, because to do so would open the door to every shipper, no matter for what purpose he might desire to use the lumber, to avail himself of it. But you buy the lumber, ship it, erect the elevator, and send us your freight bills with a certificate showing that it was put into the elevator, and we will refund you the difference between the amount charged and the actual cost of transportation."

A man at Columbia, Tenn., comes to us. He says, "I want to build a flouring mill and warehouse on the line of your road. What can you do to aid me?" The railroad people appreciate the fact that the erection of a mill and warehouse will make an increased demand for grain, resulting in increased production of grain, and consequent increase of business at that point. In addition to all of this, the mill and warehouse on the tracks increase its facilities for doing business. We say to this man, as in the case of the man at Franklin, Tenn., "Build your mill, and send us your freight bills, and we will refund you the difference between the amount charged and the actual cost of transportation."

Later on this man approaches us and says, "I have been running my mill for five months on the wheat produced in this section. The wheat is exhausted. I have a good trade in the South which I desire to keep up. If I let it go, it will require hard work to recover it when the next crop comes in. I must keep going even though I work at bare cost. I can buy wheat in Kentucky, Indiana, or Illinois, bring it here and continue to grind, but I can not do this and pay local rates into Columbia and then pay the rate on the product out." The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company realizes the force of the miller's claim, and says to him, "Go ahead, buy your wheat in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, or elsewhere, bring it to Columbia, grind it up and ship the flour to supply your customers; at the end of each month send us a statement of the wheat shipped in and the flour shipped out, and we will give you a rebate on the wheat so that the total rates on the wheat and flour combined shall equal the rates from the original point of shipment of the wheat to the point of destination of the flour."

I submit if this is calculated to injure any one. This arrangement is open to the millers on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad from one end to the other. The millers all understand it, and they are satisfied with it. It brings business to the roads, it keeps the mills going, it feeds people employed by the millers, builds up a business at the different towns, and enables the miller to hold his customers.

For the information of the committee I will say, that quite extensive milling interests have been developed and fostered in this way at all points on the line of the Louisville and Nashville road, and the general public understands that any one who wants to engage in the milling business may do so on the same terms.

There is another large interest on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, particularly in Kentucky, which has been fostered in a like manner—that of the manufacture of whisky. The grain is hauled into the distilleries at the current rates; the railroad people know how much whisky a bushel of grain will make, and concessions in the way of rebates on grain are made upon presentation of certificates showing the proper proportion of whisky shipped out. I am illustrating the rebate system particularly so far as it applies to the Louisville and Nashville road, and what I say of the Louisville and Nashville will apply to all of the Southern railroads, for all are endeavoring to build up local industries on the line of their roads.

At Nashville we have a large number of lumber-yards, planing-mills, sash, door, and blind factories, which buy their pine lumber hundreds of miles distant from Nashville. It is brought there in the rough. We say to these people, "Dress your lumber or manufacture it into sash, doors, or blinds, reship it, and in proportion to the amount reshipped we will make concession in the way of rebate on the lumber shipped in." This hurts nobody, and tends to help build up an industry which engages the labor of a large number of worthy people, and helps to make the city prosperous.

I will carry these illustrations to Judge BYNUM'S district, and I speak now from experience, because I was at one time connected with the management of a railroad in Indiana.

The Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway Company, when it finished its Chicago line into Indianapolis, about three years ago, had no terminal facilities. All of the manufacturing institutions were located on the side tracks of other railroads. A gentleman came to me and said, "I want to establish a stave and barrel factory at Indianapolis; you have the raw material on the line of your road; I wish you would aid me in bringing lumber from some point on Lake Michigan to Indianapolis to build my factory." I said to him, "Certainly; it is an industry which railroads ought to encourage. Your staves are made in the rough on the line of our road; I will undertake to carry the lumber to build your factory at the cost of transportation. It will be billed to you at full rates; pay the freight bills, and when your factory is done, send me your freight bills and I will give you a rebate between the amount charged and the actual cost of transportation."

Another Indianapolis gentleman comes and says, "I want to establish a sash, door, and blind factory at Indianapolis. There is quite a demand for sash, doors, and blinds on the line of your road. What can you do toward helping me to bring in the lumber to build my factory." I said to him, as I did to the stave-and-barrel man, "Ship your lumber, build your factory, send in your freight bills, and I will give you a rebate so that the rate of transportation shall not exceed the actual cost of the service."

Another said, "I want to build an elevator at Sheridan, on your line. I would be glad if your company would do so, but I know that it is not able. What can you do to help me?" I said to him, "Ship your lumber, build your elevator, send in the freight bills you have paid, and I will make you a rebate between the amount paid and the actual cost of transportation." Others came for the same purpose at other points on the line of the road; all were met with like encouragement.

Now I ask if this is unjust discrimination? Is this building up one shipper or manufacturer to the injury of another?

In connection with this I will return to the discussion of the coal question and that portion of it which relates to an effort of the Indiana and Illinois mines to sell bituminous and block coal in the Northwest. The rates from the mines to Chicago, as stated, are perfectly satisfactory to the miner and the Chicago dealer and consumer. The shipments of coal to reach the Northwestern States pass through Chicago. A concession, as stated, of 25, perhaps 50, cents per ton is considered necessary to enable the Indiana and Illinois miner to sell coal in the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, &c.

Some of the mines of Illinois and Indiana are owned and controlled through Chicago parties. The shipments to the Northwest are largely made through Chicago parties. Therefore to prevent any fraud upon the transportation companies the railroad companies say to the miners and the Chicago dealers, "You ship all of your coal to Chicago locally; we can not tell what goes to the Northwest or what is consumed in the city of Chicago, Therefore we will charge our full rates to Chicago on all of the coal, and if you ship 10, 15, or 20 per cent. of the coal to the Northwest, upon the presention of the bills of lading of the Northwestern roads at the end of each month we will refund you 25 or 50 cents per ton, as the case may be, on all such shipments."

This will serve as a fair illustration of the system of rebates indulged in by railway companies, and will serve to show also that they are not given for the purpose of discriminating in favor of one shipper to the injury of another, but as a means of increasing traffic, building up the industries on the line of the road, and preventing the practice of frauds upon railway companies.

If the committee were to go to the bottom of the complaints so generally and so sweepingly made of discriminations by means of drawbacks or rebates, I am quite well assured that it would find them largely, if not almost exclusively, confined to shipments made under such circumstances.

Why should such a practice be prohibited? Why not legalize rebates and drawbacks with a proviso that they shall be open to every shipper under like circumstances, and prohibit the practice only in cases where it is designed for the purpose of unjust discrimination?

Mr. BROWN. Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that no reasonable man would object to the rebate paid on the staves in the case above supposed. It simply enables the Western timber-man to find sale for probably one-tenth more staves than he could get market for in the East by shipping them to England or other foreign countries. He could not get them to the foreign market without a reduction of rates from the West to the Eastern cities. If they should give that reduction on all the staves shipped from the Western forests to the Eastern cities it would amount to a reduction of the freights so far as those for home consumption are concerned, which is a reasonable freight, and at which neither the producer nor consumer of the staves complains.

The best way of reaching the case properly is to charge all Western staves the same price to the Eastern cities, and then, as stated by Mr. Stahlman, on the production of the ship's bills of lading, showing that a certain quantity of them have been shipped abroad, say one-tenth for instance, to rebate or refund to the owner of those shipped abroad the concession made in the price of transportation to enable him to send them abroad. Bear in mind, Mr. President, there is no unjust discrimination in this matter, as the same rate for staves to be used in the Eastern cities is given to every shipper, and the same rebate is given to each shipper who desires to send them abroad.

In the matter of the erection of elevators, mills, factories for manufacturing doors, sash, blinds, &c., nobody will question that the community is interested. The location of one of these establishments in a community increases the production, helps to create a home market, gives wages to labor that might otherwise be unemployed, and gives a daily freight of considerable quantity to the railroad company upon which the establishment is located. Who can doubt, in such case, that it is the interest not only of the railroad, whose regular freight is increased, to make a concession in freights on the building material which it does not make to other consumers, but that it is also the interest of the community, which is greatly benefited by the construction and use of such factories, elevators, &c., which might not otherwise be erected.

Again, who can doubt the wisdom and the benefit not only to the transportation companies but to the community of a concession made by the transportation companies to the coal shipped from Indiana or Illinois west of Chicago, when the Chicago market is not sufficient to take all which can be successfully mined, and when the coal is needed in Wisconsin and Minnesota by consumers who can not afford to use it if it is charged the same rate of freight per mile from the mines to the place of consumption in those extreme Northwestern States which it is now charged from the mines to Chicago? In such case Chicago suffers no injury by the reduction in favor of those three or four or five hundred miles farther west, as the Chicago prices have not increased.

And as but a limited proportion of the productions of the mines are shipped to the far West, a railroad company could not afford to put down the rates of eight-tenths of its whole production to secure the patronage at the lower rate of two-tenths of it; and yet, as there are periods when the demand is not sufficient at Chicago to take the whole output of the mines, it is the interest of the miners to keep their employés at work and to sell the remnant of the amount produced farther west at a lower price rather than fail to work full time. Consequently all interests are served by the rebate. The miner gets regular employment from the owner of the mine; the owner of the mine makes a small amount of profit on the coal that is sold at the reduced price; the transportation companies realize a small profit on that which goes beyond Chicago. The people of Chicago are no way in danger, because the price of their coal is not increased. They pay just what they would have to pay if the arrangement farther west were not made, and the people farther west secure the coal at a price at which they can afford to use it, and they are benefited. But you may say, why make the rebate? Why not make a lower rate from the mines to the consumer? For the reason that if you should do this all who ship to Chicago would claim that they were going to ship west, and you would have no means of ascertaining whether the coal went west or whether it was consumed in Chicago; but when it is shipped to Chicago at the regular rate and is then reshipped by bill of lading to the far West, the quantity sent west can be readily ascertained by such bills of lading, and freight can then be put at the reduced rate on what is really in good faith shipped west by a rebate, paying the difference in freight which is allowed by the reduction of price for that going farther west. This results in mutual and general benefit, as all shippers engaged in the same business get the same benefit, and it is no injury to anybody. Then why should we make a stringent rule or law prohibiting it?

Mr. President, it is as difficult to undertake to regulate by inflexible rules of law the transportation of commerce as it is to regulate commerce itself. In other words, it is as difficult to regulate transportation by fixed rules as it is to regulate prices in the daily traffic business of the community. If you should undertake to fix by stubborn rules of law the price of wheat, corn, bacon, lard, butter, and the like in the different cities and communities where a trade and traffic in these articles are conducted, you would find little less embarrassment than you do when you undertake to regulate the transportation of commerce by fixed, inflexible rules of law. It can never be successfully accomplished, and probably the best that can be done if we can get a conservative, intelligent well-balanced commission is to leave all these delicate and difficult matters in their hands, giving them the power to make the rules governing transportation elastic, as the exigencies may require.

After they have investigated the question thoroughly and looked into it in all its bearings they will usually be able to determine what is necessary or what is the best that can be done for the transportation companies and the communities under the circumstances by which they may be at the time surrounded. But if you bind them "fast as fate" by unbending rules of law that have no elasticity you will find the machine will not work, the wheels will be screaking in a hundred places, different interests will be suffering, and there will be a general outcry and clamor against laws which operate so unjustly, which cripple commerce, embarrass manufacturing interests, discourage production at points far in the interior, seriously injure, if they do not destroy, important branches of our foreign trade, and prevent that general and free interchange of commodities which is essential to the well-being and prosperity of a great country like the United States. We had better hasten slowly in this matter, doing as little as possible to cripple and as much as possible to build up all the great interests of a great and prosperous people. Let us profit by the experience of other nations who have thoroughly investigated these questions, and learn wisdom by their example.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. CULLOM. Before taking a vote on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, I wish to ask the Senate to make one or two formal amendments in the reprint of the bill.

In section 2, line 1, after the word "carrier," I move to insert the words "subject to the provisions of this act." Those words were dropped out in the printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 1, after the word "carrier," insert the words "subject to the provisions of this act;" so as to read:

That if any commen carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall directly or indirectly, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. In section 5, line 2, after the word "after," I move to strike out the words "this act shall take effect" and insert the words "the appointment of the commission hereinafter provided for;" and in line 3, to strike out "the" and insert "said," before the word "commission."

The reason for this amendment lies in the fact that it may be sixty days or thereabouts after the act shall take effect before the President of the United States could select a commission whose duty it will largely be to put the section in force. As I propose to amend the section the sixty days will apply to the time after the appointment of the commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send the amendment to the desk.

Mr. CULLOM. I will send up the bill with the amendment marked on it.

Mr. HARRIS. I have it here, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Tennessee has it also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 2, after the word "after," it is moved to strike out the words "this act shall take effect" and to insert "the appointment of the commission hereinafter provided for;" and in line 3, to strike out the first word "the," between the words "with" and "commission," and insert the word "said;" so as to read:

That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, within sixty days after the appointment of the commission hereinafter provided for, file with said commission appointed under the provisions of this act copies of its tariffs of rates, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether the Senate understands that the Senator from West Virginia desires the last amendment he offered to be first voted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be reported that we are to vote on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," it is proposed to strike out "and from the same original point of departure;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the amendment first to be acted on, because it perfects the text and it is in order before the motion to strike out is put.

Mr. CULLOM. So I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. In order that the Senate may comprehend the precise effect of that amendment I will say a single word.

Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands common carriers are prohibited from charging more in the aggregate for the short than the long haul over the same line of road going in the same direction and from the same point of departure. To illustrate: From the city of Chicago to New York, from the point of departure, Chicago, the through rate being to New York say 10 cents a hundred pounds of grain, all shipments from Chicago to any point on that line could not exceed 10 cents a hundred pounds from Chicago to the point of destination. But leaving Chicago and taking up freight 10 miles or 50 miles or 500 miles away from Chicago on the line to New York, under the provisions of the bill as it stands the transportation company would have a right to charge as much, twice as much, or thrice as much from this midway point to New York as from Chicago to New York.

By adopting the amendment and striking out this language, my understanding is that it will mean, no matter whether you make your shipment from Chicago to some point in the direction of New York or to New York, you shall not charge more in the aggregate for the short haul than for the long haul; that if you make your shipment from any point between Chicago and New York to New York you shall not charge more for that shorter distance than you charge for the transportation over the whole line of road.

I think that explanation shows precisely what the amendment means and the effect it is intended to have; and believing that effect to be just and desirable, I shall vote for the amendment as proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CAMDEN. In addition to what has been said by the Senator from Tennessee I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the provision which relates to the long and the short haul limits it to the same original point of departure, which would leave the section to affect only shipments from the same points and would not affect shipments from any intermediate points. In other words, from a given point at a long distance, at a given rate to the seaboard or to the market, all shipments from that point must be at the same rate; but the limitation in the bill, "from the same original point of departure," does not affect the thousand other places which may be nearer to the market than the original point of departure.

This particular limitation in the fourth section, "from the same original point of departure," is a limitation which affects most largely the shipping interests of the whole country. That provision would control nine-tenths of all the shipments to which the section could apply. That was the basis chiefly upon which I addressed the Senate a few days since in urging an amendment to strike out all the limitations and all the exceptions contained in the section. I have concluded to first submit an amendment to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure" as covering the main point I desired to reach by the previous amendment.

I have given considerable thought to this subject, and I am firmly convinced in my own mind that this provision is not only of the greatest importance to the whole country of any provision which could be inserted in a bill to regulate interstate commerce, but I am, moreover, fully satisfied that the amendment would be in the interest of the railroads, for the reason that it would produce a uniformity in transportation and in the charges of railroads, which would enable a railroad to make such general tariff rates as to produce from the earnings of the road an amount to cover the fixed charges and the amount necessary for the road to make.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think I shall want to vote for a short-haul clause which does not have the words in which are proposed to be stricken out. Last year I voted against a proposition to insert a short-haul clause in a similar bill for the reason that I thought we might leave that whole subject to the commission to deal with it under the power which is given to them to prevent discrimination, and for the additional reason that I thought it might be a very dangerous experiment to try in an interstate-commerce bill, where so much of the freight consists in getting the produce of the far West to the seaboard. But subsequent reflection has convinced me that there ought to be a short-haul provision in the bill. However, I think that the clause "and from the same original point of departure" ought to be retained in the bill. To strike it out assumes that there are no points which by reason of the concentration of business at those points can do the freighting business for any less than at other less important points. It assumes, too, that you must charge the same rate over all the branches of the railroad which it affects without reference to the cost of construction or the amount of business which is to be upon those branches.

I think it is essential to keep this clause in the bill for the purpose of allowing cheap freights from the West to the East, and that under the present system of railroads to strike it out and oblige a railroad to charge from every point a thousand miles distant upon its various branches to New York as little as it would charge from the great distributing center a thousand miles away from New York would result in very great difficulty about transportation in this country. Let me illustrate by a diagram. Here is a road which is a main line and there are two branches [indicating]. One branch really forms a part of the great main line. One end of the Y I call A, the other B, and the point of destination to the seaboard C. The great bulk of the shipments on that road owned by the railroad company, of its two branches, go from A to C; but B is equally distant from C that A is. The road can afford to do its business for less, carrying great quantities of grain or other produce to market from A to C, than it can from its terminus at B, for, as I suppose in this illustration, the branch which runs up there [indicating] has cost a great deal more to build and the business on it is a great deal less. It runs through a sparsely populated country, and yet if this clause is taken out of the section it can charge no more from the great point of distribution, where the bulk of the business goes, than it is allowed to charge from the termini of the road, which is in a sparsely settled community and where there is very little business and over a road which it has cost no less to build. I think that simple illustration shows the difficulty of applying any rigid iron-bound rule per mile to this question.

Mr. CAMDEN. The Senator from Connecticut has presented an extreme case for illustration, one which perhaps does not exist in this country; and even in that case I beg to say that the Senator is mistaken in the supposition he makes. He and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] both construe the amendment into a provision that the rate shall be so much per mile. That is not the object nor the meaning of the amendment. A railroad may charge as much for 500 miles as it does for a thousand miles, and because a railroad may have two branches, as illustrated by the Senator from Connecticut, it does not limit the rate per car from the two points but simply limits the charges, by providing that the charge for the longer haul shall not be greater than the charge for the shorter haul.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me to call his attention to a fact, I will state that the bill in explicit terms confines the provision to the same line of road and going in the same direction. The Senator from Connecticut held up two different lines of road belonging to the same company, but they can not be called the same line of road.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Tennessee for making that explanation. I was going to make it, but the Senator has made it better than I could have done myself.

The principle in the bill does not apply to the illustration made by the Senator from Connecticut. I will say further, that the fourth section, in limiting it to "the same original point of departure," does not mean anything. It does not mean legislation at all upon the long and short haul question. Take a car leaving from any of our large centers of competition in the West. This clause limits the charge to the same class of shippers from that point to the same market or to intermediate points in the same direction. It limits it so that the charge for the short haul shall not exceed that for the long haul. A railroad may start out from the original point of competition and strike into a country where for 200 miles there are no competitive points. In that 200 miles of road the products of that country may be charged any amount that the railroad may choose to charge or that the freight will bear; and the fourth section will not apply to it. In other words, the distant points shall have the benefit of the competition, but it is denied to all other sections of the country.

It certainly appears to me that striking out the words "and from the same original point of departure" preserves the whole effect and virtue of the bill, if there is anything in it.

Mr. PLATT. I understand it is objected now that my illustration does not apply, because the provision of the section is "over the same line, in the same direction." I think the bill is open to a construction which would make my illustration applicable. If the word "line" means only the road between two points, and not the road owned by the company, then perhaps the illustration does not apply; but if it means the line, the road, the system which the company is operating, then it does apply.

Upon the theory that my illustration does not apply, I will take the instance again from Chicago to New York. The great bulk of the grain shipment from the West to the East leaves Chicago for the seaboard. The road has facilities for transacting that business. It can do business a great deal more cheaply where large quantities of a given kind of freight are moved than from points where but very little of that character of freight is moved.

We will suppose that the rate from Chicago to New York is exceedingly low, but the railroad is able to take the freight on account of the immense amount of business which is done, which can be done at a lower rate than where the business is very limited. Strike these words out of the bill, and then take a station 10 miles this side of Chicago, if there be such a station, where grain does not concentrate, where there are no great facilities for receiving and distributing it, but where there is a farming community. A man brings a single car-load of grain to the little station where the trains stop occasionally, and asks to have it transported to New York. When you strike out these words it is equivalent to saying that the road must take that one car-load of grain under those circumstances from that little flag-station, if you please, and carry it to New York just as cheaply as it carries the great bulk of the grain which is transported from Chicago. In other words——

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to propound two questions, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. PLATT. Allow me to finish the sentence.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. In other words, it ignores the fact that business can be done at a center where there is a great amount of business to be handled and where there are the best facilities for handling it cheaper than it can be done at a place where there is very little business done and no facilities for handling it. Now, I will hear the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the provisions of the bill as it stands, taking the illustration from Chicago to New York, every shipment made from Chicago, whether to New York or any intermediate point on the line of road, is subject to this provision, and the shorter haul can not be forced to pay more than the aggregate amount paid on the longer; but if you take up a shipment midway between Chicago and New York, at a way station, of one or fifty car-loads of freight, that shipment is not in any wise subject to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. It certainly is.

Mr. HARRIS. May not the transportation company, so far as this bill is concerned, charge twice as much for the shipment from the 500-mile station as it charges from Chicago, the thousand miles, to New York?

Mr. PLATT. If it is a fair charge it may; but the Senator has said that it could charge twice or three times as much, and the charge is still open to the provision in the bill that there must be no extortionate charges. It leaves open the whole question whether the higher charge from the little way station just this side of Chicago is a fair charge or not. If it is an unfair charge, an extortionate charge, then it is regulated by the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator if the short haul provision contained in section 4 applies to or regulates any shipment from Chicago to New York except those that start from the point of Chicago?

Mr. PLATT. It certainly does not, but it regulates——

Mr. HARRIS. Then, if it be just and reasonable and right to regulate by law the short haul leaving Chicago in the direction of New York all along the line at the various points to which shipments may go from Chicago, is there not just as much reason and justice in allowing the way station to ship from its point to New York under the same provisions and with the same limitations and with the same protections of law that the shipments can go from Chicago to the way stations or through? If there be a difference, I confess that I not able to see it.

Mr. PLATT. If you admit that justice requires an approach to the same rate per mile for freight, then the Senator from Tennessee is right; but if you admit that it may be fair and just and equitable under the circumstances of business to charge a higher rate to New York from a station 10 miles this side of Chicago under the circumstances which I have supposed, then he is entirely wrong. The question is whether there may be a discrimination on account of the amount of business to be transacted at different places and the facility of transacting it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator certainly does not intend to be understood as asserting that the striking out of this language will reduce the matter to the same rate per mile. All that it will effect is this: If you ship from the half-way station between Chicago and New York you can not charge more in the aggregate for that half distance than you are charging for the whole. It would be twice as much per mile if you charged the same aggregate amount for the freight from the 500-mile point that you charge from Chicago over the entire length of line, being a thousand miles.

Mr. PLATT. It strikes me the Senator begs the question a little when he removes the station from 10 miles this side of Chicago to 500 miles, because, if the station is 10 miles this side of Chicago, and he insists that a car-load of freight shall go from that little inconsequential station to New York at the same price that the thousand or two thousand or ten thousand car-loads a day go from Chicago, then he is reducing the rate practically to the same rate per mile from the station 10 miles this side of Chicago.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he does not think that it would be an improvement to amend the bill by inserting, in line 6 of section 4, after the word "departure," the words "or to the same point of destination;" so that the section would then read:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the same original point of departure, or to the same point of destination.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think without reflection upon it that I am quite ready to answer that question, and I am not in charge of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Such an amendment would prevent the practice to which the Senator from Tennessee has referred, that is to say, a rate fixed between Chicago and New York would apply as a limitation upon freight starting from an intermediate point to New York.

Mr. HARRIS. It would accomplish practically the object I have in view.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It seems to me that if the language proposed to be stricken out is left in the bill the amendment I suggest would be an improvement on the system proposed by the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. But looking to the illustration that we have been using, if this section is left to stand as it now is in the bill without modification or change, there is no reason why the transportation company may not within 10 miles of the city of New York charge the same rate or double the rate that it charges all the way from Chicago to New York.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is a difficulty which has occurred to my mind. Undoubtedly if the language of the bill is left as it now stands the implication is unavoidable that a common carrier within the terms of the bill may charge a rate as great for 500 miles as for a thousand miles.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; or for 11 miles.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That would be the legitimate and necessary implication arising upon the language of the bill. Therefore I desire to have the section amended in that regard by the insertion of this language:

But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance.

This would negative the implication that necessarily arises upon the language used in the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. PLATT. The criticism which is made now by the Senator from Tennessee, and also by the Senator from Iowa, applies equally to every short-haul law that has been passed in the different States as to this bill, and the answer to it is simply this: That it is unnecessary. No railroad company would suppose that it was authorized by any such provision in the bill prohibiting it from charging more for the shorter than for the longer distances to charge, for instance, as much upon freight starting within a hundred miles of New York to go to New York as it would charge for freight starting at Chicago to go the thousand miles to New York. If it did suppose that it was authorized to do it, all that the shipper would have to do would be to apply to the commission and say that the railroad company was demanding exorbitant and extortionate charges, and it would be remedied in that way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We might avoid that by expressly providing that that implication shall not apply. If the language remains as it now stands in the bill, undoubtedly if a railroad company should charge as much for a hundred-mile haul as it does for a thousand miles, and complaint should be made by the shipper, the answer would be, "We are not charging any more than the law allows, for it says 'you shall not charge any more for the short haul than for the long haul,' and we are charging the same."

Mr. PLATT. To illustrate further my answer to that point, there is no law now which prevents a railroad from charging $10 per ton per mile for its freight; but the railroad company does not do that, and it can not do it under the conditions of business; nor can it under the conditions of business charge as much, to use the illustration, for a haul of a hundred miles into New York as it charges for the haul of a thousand miles from Chicago into New York. No practical difficulty has been suggested, and if there were, the remedy is in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 26, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If I heard aright the reading of the Journal the statement that I asked unanimous consent to call up a bill for the construction of a bridge over the Ohio River is an error. The RECORD shows that it was called up by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER].

The SPEAKER. The bill was called up by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER]. If the Journal is in error the correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PETTIBONE, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. O'DONNELL, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, indefinitely.

To Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MARKHAM, for one week, on account of important business.

BUSINESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS COMMITTEE.

Mr. DUNN. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 11th, and Wednesday, the 12th days of May, 1886, after the morning hour for the call of committees for reports and consideration of measures, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state to the gentleman from Arkansas that the 11th day of May was on Saturday evening set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DUNN. We examined the Calendar of Special Orders before drawing the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. The order to which I refer does not appear in the last print of the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the assignment of the 11th of May.

Mr. DUNN. Then I will ask that the committee be limited to the 12th, with a recess from half past 5 until half past 7.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. What measures do the committee propose to call up?

Mr. DUNN. There are several measures. The first on the Calendar is the bill to require the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying its lands. Another measure is a resolution providing for an investigation of the business of the Pacific railroads which have been aided by the Government. Another measure is the general bill providing for an amendment of the laws in relation to paying the debts of the Pacific railroads to the Government.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does the resolution include a bill to grant certain privileges to the Northern Pacific Railroad in the Yellowstone Park?

Mr. DUNN. It does not. There is no such measure reported from the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the resolution include a bill for funding the debt of the Pacific railroads?

Mr. DUNN. It does.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I object.

Mr. DUNN. If objection is made, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. The bill to which the gentleman from Ohio refers provides for the payment of $41,000,000 of that debt at a time before it becomes due under existing law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would object to any bill or proposition to postpone the debt.

Mr. DUNN. It is not proper to say that the bill postpones the debts. It anticipates a large portion of them, and postpones a portion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is very important that bill should come before the House. While I am opposed to the extension of the time, I am very anxious to see the bill brought before the House for consideration. When once before the House the House will have control of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is the resolution so drawn as to interfore with prior orders?

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 12th day of May, 1886, after the morning hour for the call of committees for reports and consideration of measures, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and that a recess be had at 5 o'clock till 7.30 p. m., to be devoted to the same purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall have to object, as the resolution does not except prior orders.

Mr. DUNN. It simply asks for one day.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. COWLES. I object to the consideration of Pacific Railroad matters in night session, when we rarely have a quorum.

Mr. DUNN. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. COBB, as a matter of privilege, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands the bill (H. R. 8104) to forfeit lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Marquette to Ontonagon, in said State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

POWDER DEPOT, DOVER, N. J.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration a Senate bill granting the right of way through lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad. This is a Senate bill, and it has been reported favorably by the House committee. There is no objection to it. The Secretary of War approves of it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. Before he had concluded the reading,

Mr. STEELE said: I call for the regular order. That bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS. The bill has been reported favorably by that committee.

Some time subsequently—

Mr. STEELE withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading of the bill was not completed. I did not notice, so far as it was read, any provision in it for the assessment of damages.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, which is as follows:

A bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company.

Whereas an act of Congress was passed heretofore in the following words, to wit:

"An act to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way, not exceeding 100 feet in width, through the lands of the United States included in the Piccatinny powder depot near Dover, in the State of New Jersey, is hereby granted to the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, for the purpose of constructing a railroad: Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof, through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works: Provided also, That such sidings, tracks, switches, and loading stations as may at any time be required by the Secretary of War shall be promptly provided by said railroad company; and that such stoppage of trains and generally such facilities and privileges as the United States may desire for the shipment of materials of war, at any time, shall be provided by said railroad company: Provided also, That whenever said right of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid, the same shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

"Approved July 31, 1882." And

Whereas said Central Railroad Company have not used said grant or built or constructed said railroad, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary, have expressly waived their right to the same and to all rights which they may have acquired under said act of Congress; and

Whereas it is desirable that the said railroad should be built, and it is now proposed to be built by the Morris County Railroad Company, subject only to the action of Congress in the matter: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way, not exceeding 100 feet in width, through the lands of the United States included in the Piccatinny powder depot, near Dover, in the State of New Jersey, is hereby granted to the Morris County Railroad Company of New Jersey for the purpose of constructing a railroad: Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof, through said lands, and regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works: Provided also, That such sidings, tracks, switches, and loading stations as may at any time be required by the Secretary of War shall be promptly provided by said railroad company; and that such stoppage of trains and generally such facilities and privileges as the United States may desire for the shipment of materials of war, at any time, shall be provided by said railroad company: Provided also, That whenever said right of way shall cease to be used for the purpose aforesaid the same shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

SEC. 2. That the authority heretofore granted to the Central Railroad of New Jersey to construct a railroad through the property of the United States used by the Government as a powder depot, near Dover, N. J., be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the privilege of explaining this bill for two minutes. There is nothing suspicious about it except its length; and it is so long because the committees of the Senate and the House which have considered it, in their fidelity to duty, made these additional provisions for the security of the Government. It grants the right of way to this New Jersey Railroad Company through a Government reservation now under the control of the Secretary of War, because the reservation is used as a powder depot. The reservation has no railway connection, and the railway connection is as important for the Government as it is for the railway company.

The Government is in favor of this railroad connection. It is recommended by the Secretary of War. He himself has reviewed and approved of the bill, and there is no reason why it should not be passed and passed immediately, as the construction of the railroad is stopped now at the line of the Government reservation. It has all the safeguards passed by a committee of the Senate, passed by two committees of the House—that on Public Buildings and Grounds and that on Military Affairs—and is recommended by the Department of War.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the need of so much land? One hundred feet is a great deal where land is valuable.

Mr. PHELPS. It is not too much.

Mr. MILLS. You want something extra for sidings, I understand.

Mr. PHELPS. No; only the 100 feet. The sidings are to be put in as the Government may desire.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Upon the 100 feet?

Mr. PHELPS. Upon the 100 feet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order, and also resolutions of inquiry.

AARON P. GRAY.

MARY F. JACKSON.

Mr. NEECE introdueed a bill (H. R. 8116) granting a pension to Mary F. Jackson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NANCY CISCO.

Mr. NEECE also introduced a bill (H. R. 8117) granting a pension to Nancy Cisco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE STODD.

Mr. NEECE also introduced a bill (H. R. 8118) granting a pension to George Stodd; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. 8119) to establish a department of labor, and to create a board for the arbitration of controversies between labor and capital; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

DAKOTA AS A STATE.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. 8120) to enable the people of Dakota to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

AWARDS UNDER CONVENTION WITH MEXICO.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. 8121) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. 8122) to amend and enlarge the fifth section of an act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURTS IN TERRITORIES.

In case the said bill should not be taken up on that day, then the same may be called up on any other day thereafter after the hour for the consideration of bills.

TARIFF ON UNMANUFACTURED WOOL.

Mr. WILKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Whereas one of the propositions contained in the tariff bill reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee is to place upon the free-list all unmanufactured wools; and

Whereas the season is at hand when the product grown during the past year is marketed by the grower; and

Whereas the aforementioned proposition to put wool upon the free-list, the uncertainty and doubt pending the action of the House upon this subject is causing an unnecessary and serious loss to the wool-grower, which loss without prompt action on the part of this body will amount to many millions of dollars without corresponding benefit to the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the wool-tariff schedule under existing law, so far as it relates to unmanufactured wool, should not be reduced.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE—ARBITRATION.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. 8224) to regulate commerce by land among the States and to provide for boards of arbitration; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). This bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bill, as will be seen from its title, relates to two subjects—one is interstate commerce, the other the subject of arbitration, which has been referred to the Committee on Labor and which a special committee is now investigating. I question whether the bill should not, perhaps, be referred to the Committee on Labor, though I am not particular about the matter. The bill relates in the first place to interstate commerce——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the bill properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In addition to the provisions relating to interstate commerce, the bill proposes the establishment of boards of arbitration, which subject is now before the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands, however, that the controlling subject of the bill is interstate commerce.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not more than the provisions in regard to arbitration. However, I am not tenacious in regard to the reference.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7723) for the relief of certain surviving widows of soldier who served in the late war with Great Britain in 1812 and 1815; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EDWIN STEVENS.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 7809) for the relief of Edwin Stevens; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DR. F. O. ST. CLAIR.

Mr. SPRINGER also, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6375) to refund to Dr. F. O. St. Clair $97.80, duty on a monument to the memory of Francis J. Townshend, late of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States in writing was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries. It also announced the approval of House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War; and

An act (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance of Chesapeake Bay.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There being no further reports from committees, the hour for the consideration of bills begins at 2 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES. I call up for consideration the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama. This bill is but a dozen lines or so in length, and therefore there is no difficulty at all about understanding it; and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. As in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a district judge for the southern judicial district of the State of Alabama; and that said judge shall be entitled to receive the same yearly salary and to be paid in the same manner that the judge of the other district court of said State is allowed and paid.

SEC. 2. That terms of the district court for the southern district of Alabama shall, in addition to the regular terms as now provided by law, be held on the fourth Mondays in October, February, and April in each year, for the purpose of deciding causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. That the district judge for the southern district of Alabama shall reside at Mobile.

The committee recommend to add, after the word "Mobile," in section 3, the words "after his appointment."

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the State of Alabama has by law four courts, held at the cities of Huntsville, Birmingham, Montgomery, and Mobile. We have but one district judge, who resides at Montgomery. The court was provided for at Birmingham during the last Congress. That town now has a population of 23,000 people and is rapidly growing.

It is in the midst of the great mineral district, the iron and coal producing region of Alabama, and the business in the Federal court has increased to such an extent that Judge Bruce's time is pretty much all taken up in holding the courts at these four points. In fact his time is so limited necessarily, that a large amount of business is delayed on account of the inability of the judge to hold court for a sufficient length of time.

Mr. BAYNE. If I understood the reading of this bill, the original bill required that the judge should reside at Mobile.

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. And the committee have proposed to amend it so as to require his residence there after his appointment?

Mr. OATES. That is it.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask, as a lawyer, whether, if the judge should reside somewhere else in the district outside of Mobile, he being upon the bench, would his decisions as a United States judge be invalidated by that residence at any other point in the district than that fixed in the bill?

Mr. OATES. The object and purpose of that provision is not to exclude from the President's choice any citizen of the State; but after the appointment the committee thought proper to enact by law that he should be required to reside at Mobile, because one of the main objects of creating an additional judge is to have him there at that city for admiralty business.

Mr. BAYNE. But would it not be putting a sort of inhibition upon that judge which does not apply to any other judge in the United States?

Mr. OATES. I think not.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. OATES. Certainly. I will yield for two minutes to my colleague.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. That arrangement would not be different from other instances which may be cited in other States. For instance, section 553 of the Revised Statutes provides in regard to the judge of the district of Florida that—

The district judge for the district of Florida shall reside at Key West.

Mr. BAYNE. That is about the only exception. I imagine there is no other provision requiring a judge to reside at any particular point.

Mr. OATES. If there is any objection to the amendment of the committee I shall withdraw it, as I think I can safely do so, speaking for the committee, and will therefore not insist upon the amendment at all. It was simply for the purpose, as I have said, of making the bill clear, so that citizens outside of that district should not be ineligible to appointment by the President.

The necessity for the court is most apparent on account, first, of the large amount of business which is brought to that court in the shape of timber depredations. That southern district of Alabama is a great timber region, and the majority of the timber depredations committed are within that district, and the depredators are carried to that court for trial. That increases very much the criminal business there. The admiralty business, as every gentleman must know, is of a character that should be speedily adjudicated; because in the case of a libel against a ship (and the large majority of those coming there are foreign or sea-going vessels) it is a great hardship for the vessel to have to enter into bond in double the amount of the sum claimed in the case and return and litigate it. From the very nature of their business the officers and crew are usually the only witnesses; and every one knows that when these ships touch at different points these are likely to be lost sight of, by being paid off and discharged; and the inconvenience is such that it amounts practically to a denial of justice; the officers of many of these vessels being willing to submit to the wrong or injustice and pay a claim rather than be put to the necessity of returning and litigating it.

The bar of Mobile sent to Congress a letter setting forth the reasons. This letter is signed by forty of the most prominent attorneys of the city of Mobile. That city now has a population of 40,000. There are at least 300 sea-going vessels which enter that port and depart annually, 150,000 tons of freight are thus carried, and the business is constantly increasing, and the city growing in population.

Mr. LITTLE. How many other cities are there in that district?

Mr. OATES. That is the only city within the southern district. There are frequently also marine torts committed, sometimes involving not a large amount, two or three or five hundred dollars; and vessels rather than be tied up will pay whatever is demanded, whether just or unjust.

Mr. RANNEY. Is there but one judge now for Alabama?

Mr. OATES. As I have said, there is but one judge and there are four courts. I have here a letter from Judge Bruce sanctioning this bill. He thinks it rather immodest in him to advocate it, but states his time is altogether taken up in holding his courts. I have also a letter from Judge Pardee, the United States circuit judge, in whose circuit that State is. I will read it to the House. It is addressed to the Hon. F. Bromberg, a former member of the House from that district. He says:

From my observation and experience in Alabama I have no hesitancy in saying that there ought to be an additional judge in that State, and that one of the additional judges in the State should reside in Mobile, so as to give personal attention to admiralty business. You can send this letter to the honorable Judiciary Committee of the Senate, if you see fit.

Respectfully,

JOHN A. PARDEE.

Now, with this explanation, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question or to oppose this bill, I will move the previous question. Before doing so, let me say, however, that only on Saturday this House passed a bill providing for an additional judge for the State of California—a State much inferior to Alabama in population, and presumably in business. This judge, the bill provides, shall receive the same salary as the other district judge within the State, which is $3,500, the lowest salary paid; and there are four courts in the district.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I understand you leave out the amendment as to the residence of the judge.

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir. I move the previous question.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not move the previous question. We want some more light. I want to know what is the salary of the present judge.

Mr. OATES. Three thousand five hundred dollars, the lowest that is paid any district judge, and the salary for this judge it is proposed shall be the same.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to propose an amendment to the bill to strike out the lines which require that the judge shall reside at Mobile.

Mr. OATES. That is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). That can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent, having been reported by the committee. If there be no objection it will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the bill is that he shall reside at Mobile.

Mr. OATES. That is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of that provision? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire a moment. I have so often expressed regret that the number of the Federal courts should be increased so rapidly that it is hardly necessary for me to repeat what I have often said before. Gentlemen tell me on all sides that it is their belief that the jurisdiction of those courts should be diminished rather than that the number of the judges and the number of places for holding courts should be increased; and yet at every session of Congress we are extending that system, and we are correspondingly year after year rendering unimportant the judicial systems of our respective States. I am not informed myself, in the circle of Federal judicial affairs with which I am acquainted, that any benefit whatever has resulted to the people in general by this steady and remorseless extension of the system and the gradual superseding of the State judiciary.

Take my own State of Indiana, a State with a port on Lake Michigan, bordered on the entire eastern and southern sides by the Ohio River with quite a number of important commercial towns, with more or less maritime and admiralty business both on the north and south, with four points at which courts are held in addition to the capital, and I am not aware that of recent years there has been a word of complaint. That was true even while the bankrupt law was in operation, throwing a vast body of business into that court.

I should hardly think it likely that the State of Alabama would furnish as large an amount of business. The State of Ohio is divided into two districts, one on the Ohio the other on Lake Erie, in both of which a large amount of business accumulates, certainly more than would accumulate either in the State of Alabama or in the State of Indiana, yet one judge in each of the two districts is deemed sufficient.

The State of Illinois, with great maritime interests on the Mississippi and the Ohio and Lake Michigan, with perhaps in some respects the second most important port in the country, has two districts.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there was only one district judge in Ohio?

Mr. HOLMAN. I said there were two districts, and one judge in each district.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. There are two districts in Alabama and four courts.

Mr. HOLMAN. In Indiana there are four points at which court is held besides Indianapolis.

The public interests are not subserved by the creation of these additional places for holding courts. The local convenience of lawyers is benefited, but nothing more. After the decision of the Supreme Court which deprived the State courts of jurisdiction in maritime cases the argument in favor of this policy was that you must establish courts upon the rivers, or else confer special powers upon your commissioners; and accordingly after that decision (some fourteen years ago) the number of points for the holding of Federal courts was materially increased, especially where questions in admiralty were springing up. But that business is not increasing; the bankrupt business has been disposed of; the number of internal-revenue cases is growing less and less every year. The fact is urged by my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] in behalf of this bill that there are a great many prosecutions in the Federal courts in Alabama growing out of depredations on the timber lands, but that business is steadily declining; the forests are being disposed of year by year. It seems to me, sir, that we are making a mistake in extending the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. We are dwarfing our State judicial systems. Recently in a single State—an inland State in the main, with but one important river on one of its borders—we have created six places for holding Federal courts; the State immediately south of it has eight.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What State has the eight places?

Mr. HOLMAN. The State of Iowa, I believe. That is my recollection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That State has now six places, and I understand that a bill has been reported to give her seven, but not eight.

Mr. HOLMAN. I may be mistaken about that; but I thought there were eight.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SYMES. Is it not much better for the people to have the places for holding the Federal courts distributed through the principal towns of a State than to allow a non-resident suitor, by removing his suit into a Federal court, to drag parties and witnesses a long distance at great expense?

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not very often occur.

Mr. SYMES. It occurs very often.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not very often occur. The tendency of our system is to enable non-resident corporations doing business in the respective States to make use of the Federal judiciary to drag people from their homes and from their respective counties to remote points at which courts having Federal jurisdiction are held. That is one of the evils of the system. As can be seen by looking at the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States a large proportion of the cases of the Federal courts in the several States now are at the instance of non-resident corporations. You can cut off largely the jurisdiction of the Federal courts by simply placing non-resident corporations doing business in the several States on the same footing as citizens of the States.

Mr. SYMES. The cases to which you refer are the large cases.

Mr. HOLMAN. For one, I regard the failure to apply a remedy on that point as in large degree the outgrowth of the policy we have been pursuing of extending facilities for the holding of Federal courts.

Mr. SYMES. But it is only the large cases, involving large amounts, that come to the Supreme Court. You can not appeal a case from the circuit court involving less than $5,000, and it is generally $5,000, or below that amount, that is involved in the cases where the people are so much interested in not being dragged from their homes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The dragging from their homes is the result of the extension of the Federal system. If the jurisdiction of the Federal courts was restricted within proper limits, as it was twenty-five years ago and as it was intended to be by the founders of the Government, the number of cases brought in those courts would be comparatively small; but under the present policy they are increasing from year to year, and increasing mainly through the extraordinary prerogatives vested in corporations doing business in the States and claiming to be non-residents.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit a suggestion, I wish to remind him that it is not the amount involved that gives jurisdiction, but the non-residence.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have an instance under our present system of a corporation in the State of Kentucky, a local corporation in that State, managing a great railway system west of the Mississippi River embracing four or five great corporate bodies and extending to the Pacific Ocean, and one object of forming that corporation in the State of Kentucky was to enable this series of corporations to obtain a standing in the Federal courts as against the Territorial or State courts. That is an illustration, and one of the results, of the extension of the Federal judicial system.

In my own State, speaking with some knowledge of affairs there for forty years, I am able to say with confidence that, so far as the public interests are concerned, a single Federal court at the capital of the State would have been amply sufficient to accomplish every desirable object, especially if there was a reasonable limitation placed upon the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Within fifteen years the cost of those courts has increased fourfold beyond what it need be or ought to be.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Indiana confounds a proposition for extension of jurisdiction with a provision to carry out the jurisdiction already existing.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will allow me, as long as there is a motive for extending the system the system will continue to be extended. When you restrict the jurisdiction, your motive for the extension will be gone.

Mr. OATES. The remarks of the gentleman are applicable to a bill that is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. It never will be before the House if you continue this system.

Mr. OATES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The last House of Representatives passed a bill to restrict to some extent the jurisdiction of the United States circuit courts upon some of the points to which the gentleman has referred, and if he will look at the Calendar he will find that a bill on the same line has been reported from the Judiciary Committee of this House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think the bill to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] refers did not pass at the last session.

Mr. OATES. It passed the House but did not pass the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 2239) extending the time for the completion of the records of the clerk of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and the transfer of the same to the Department of State; and

A bill (H. R. 6980) making appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate the unexpended balance therefor.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, a bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does this bill create a new judicial district?

Mr. OATES. The district is already created; the bill simply provides for the appointment of an additional judge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does it create any new divisions?

Mr. OATES. It does not.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How many divisions are there now in the State?

Mr. OATES. Four. Judge Bruce, if this bill be passed, will still hold the three courts in the middle and northern part of the State.

Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was passed, there being—ayes 70, noes 16.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF SMALL SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Mr. MILLER (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called) said: I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the resolution reported this morning by the Committee on Banking and Currency, fixing a time for the consideration of House bill No. 5788. The resolution will be printed and placed on the Calendar by to-morrow morning, when we would be entitled to call it up, and we could meanwhile occupy the time to-day with other business, as I believe we are entitled to an hour. But I ask leave that the resolution be considered now, because that course will save a great deal of time to the House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, May 20, 1886, be set apart for the consideration of House bill 5788, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House, not to interfere with general appropriation bills, bills raising revenue, nor prior orders; and if for any reason said bill should not be considered, or the consideration thereof completed on that day, that this order shall continue from day to day until said bill is finally disposed of by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the bill to which the resolution refers?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not state the nature of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. MILLER. It is simply a bill to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue upon silver in the Treasury silver certificates of the denominations of one, two, and five dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. MILLER. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to call up, and ask the House to concur in, the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names and locations.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After the word "on," in line 13, page 1, insert "to any other place within the same State not more than 30 miles distant."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. There is no other business that I am directed by the committee to bring before the House.

SUBTREASURY AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

Mr. MCCREARY (when the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was called) said: I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 902) establishing a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. As in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? The Chair hears none. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed an assistant treasurer of the United States, to be located in the city of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky; and such assistant treasurer shall be appointed in like manner, for like time, and be subject to all the provisions of law to which the other assistant treasurers of the United States are subject.

SEC. 2. That there shall be prepared within the custom-house of said city suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the assistant treasurer herein authorized, and sufficient and secure fire-proof vaults and safes for the safe-keeping of the public moneys collected and deposited with him; and the said assistant treasurer shall have the custody and care of said rooms, vaults, and safes as may be temporarily assigned to him, and he shall perform all the duties required to be performed by other United States assistant treasurers in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of such moneys.

SEC. 3. That the assistant treasurer authorized by this act to be appointed shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum, to be paid quarter-yearly, at the Treasury of the United States, which shall be in full for his services.

SEC. 4. That there shall be employed in the office of said assistant treasurer one clerk at $1,800 a year, one clerk at $1,600, one assistant messenger at $720, and two watchmen at $720 each, which officers shall be appointed in the same manner as is now provided by law for the offices of other subtreasurers.

SEC. 5. That there shall be appropriated and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in such repairs and alterations as may be necessary to put in good condition for immediate use such offices, rooms, vaults, and safes herein mentioned as may be required, and in the purchase of any additional furniture and fixtures, and in defraying any other incidental expenses necessary to carry this act into effect.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which had this bill under consideration, unanimously instructed me to report it with a recommendation that it pass. I shall be very brief in what I have to say in its support.

The monetary transactions of the Government are now conducted through the office of the United States Treasurer in connection with forty-one national-bank depositories and nine subtreasuries, located at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, and San Francisco. No subtreasury has been established in this country since 1873, though during the intervening period the country has grown in every respect. We believe, therefore, that another subtreasury is necessary. The question, then, is where should the additional subtreasury be located? In determining this question we ought to consider geographical position, accessibility to the surrounding country, distributing power, amount and charactor of present and prospective collections, and disbursements of public money. Applying these tests, I believe that the subtreasury should be located at Louisville, Ky.

It is hardly necessary for me to say much about Louisville. As is well known, it is the metropolis of Kentucky. It is by water 132 miles below Cincinnati, 598 miles below Pittsburgh, 368 miles above Cairo, 607 miles above Memphis, and 1,337 miles above New Orleans. There is no subtreasury between Louisville and New Orleans. Louisville is situated midway between the Gulf of Mexico and the northern lakes. It is also in the heart of the valley of the Ohio, which comprehends an area of 201,720 square miles—about double the area of France and nearly equal to that of Germany. Many navigable rivers are accessible by steamers from the wharves of Louisville, and this city has opened avenues of trade to a vast and wealthy domain, comprising sixteen States. The railway connections at Louisville are excellent; perhaps as good as or better than those of any other city in the South. These railroads give her direct communication with all parts of the country by the following trunk lines: Louisville and Nashville Railroad; Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad; Louisville Short Line Railroad; Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis Railroad; Louisville, Evansville and Saint Louis Railroad; and the Cincinnati Southern by way of the Louisville and Knoxville Railroad.

The last census shows that the center of population of the United States is in the State of Kentucky, and Louisville is near that center.

Within 300 miles of Louisville, or twelve hours' journey, there are eleven million people. As a distributing point Louisville is unexcelled. While at many cities the coin of the United States would be distributed at an expense to the Government, the products of the State of Kentucky and the extensive business and manufacturing interests of the city of Louisville would secure this distribution through the natural channels of trade without much cost.

There are in Louisville 1,352 manufacturing establishments in active operation, with a capital of $40,000,000. These establishments employ 24,000 workmen, and put in the market annually finished wares amounting to $60,000,000. Louisville is the second city in the United States in the manufacture of furniture, and is also one of the leading pork-packing cities of the country, having invested in the pork and ham trade a capital of nearly $3,000,000. Louisville is perhaps the largest plow-manufacturing city in the world, the united capacity of its plow manufactories being 1,500 per day.

Over 200,000 plows and 50,000 cultivators are annually manufactured in that city. The sale of tobacco at Louisville from January 1, 1885, to January 1, 1886, amounted to more than 127,000 hogsheads, showing that in the tobacco business Louisville leads the world. She also leads in Kentucky jeans, jeans clothing, gas and water pipes, live-stock, cement, fine sole-leather, plate-glass, and fine whiskies.

Aside from being a commercial center of acknowledged size and importance equal to other cities where subtreasuries are now located, Louisville has banking institutions numbering twenty-four, with, I believe, upward of $8,000,000 of capital. The internal revenue collected last year in the State of Kentucky amounted to $14,482,000. No other State of this Union poured into the Treasury of the United States a larger amount of reveuue than the State of Kentucky except the State of Illinois. Kentucky, therefore, stands second among the States so far as the payment of revenue into the Treasury is concerned.

There is also at Louisville a pension agency; and the disbursements at Louisville on account of the pension laws of the United States were last year $1,815,926. In this respect Louisville will compare favorably with the majority of the subtreasury cities, because of the nine subtreasury cities only five—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and San Francisco—have pension agencies.

The annual cost of this subtreasury will be small, amounting in all to only $9,560 per annum. The bill also provides that $5,000 be appropriated to make such repairs and alterations as may be necessary in the custom-house, and furnish the rooms in such proper manner as to make them suitable for a subtreasury.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the bill will pass. No additional subtreasury has been established since 1873, and I believe Louisville, as the great focal center of the Mississippi Valley, is the proper place to locate a subtreasury. It will be of great service to the Southern States, it will be a great convenience to the pension business, and it will be a valuable auxiliary to the Government in a State where the internal-revenue collections amount to about $14,000,000 per annum.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill. I concede, however, that if there is to be another assistant treasurer appointed and another subtreasury established by the Government, the proper location would be at Louisville, Ky. But instead of establishing additional subtreasuries and appointing more assistant treasurers, in my judgment in would be far better to reduce the number we already have. I would abolish several of those we now have, for the reason that I believe the policy of small subtreasuries to be not only costly, but positively hurtful to the business interest of the country.

What reason is there for a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky.? I can see none. Will it benefit the people of Louisville? I maintain that it will not be of the least benefit to the people there. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that there has not been a petition sent in here from the banking institutions of that city against the establishment of this subtreasury at Louisville.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say every bank in Louisville has asked for the passage of this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am quite surprised at that. I am sure it has not been asked for or recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor by the Treasurer.

What possible advantage can it be to the people of Louisville? It will add nothing to their capital. It would be far better to have the collections made daily at Louisville by Government agents, deposited in some one of the banks, or better perhaps let the banks associate together and deposit security with the Treasurer, and then have the money collected deposited daily with them. That is substantially what is done now, not only here, but elsewhere where there are no subtreasuries. Money deposited in this way is, to a certain extent, loanable capital, which may be used. This is the way it ought to be in Cincinnati and in other places. I wish there was no subtreasury in Cincinnati, and that instead the banks were made depositories of moneys collected and to be paid out there.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have now nearly $500,000,000 locked up in Treasury vaults and withdrawn from circulation. Two hundred and fifty million dollars, or thereabout, are for the purpose of meeting the demand liabilities of the Government, or as trust funds to cover certain outstanding obligations. The rest is surplus pure and simple—money withdrawn from circulation, taken right out of the business of the country. In England if the revenues of the government exceed the expenditures the excess becomes simply a credit in the Bank of England to the government. So it is in the Bank of France, and so, too, in the Bank of Germany. No other civilized country in the world withdraws from circulation a great mass of capital and locks it up in a treasury and subtreasuries. No other country does this, and in my judgment it is time we abandon it. But instead of pursuing the course other countries have found so advantageous, we go on establishing more treasuries to bury more money in.

Where shall we stop? After establishing this one at Louisville, are we going on to establish additional subtreasuries and appoint additional subtreasurers at Galveston, Tex.; Saint Paul, Minn.; Omaha, Nebr.; Cleveland, Ohio, and other places where I understand they are asked for? If we do, what will be the result? It will cost from $10,000 to $20,000 a year at each place to take care of the money of the Government, and you will simply withdraw so much more money from use as capital and bury it in your vaults.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. Is it not a fact that the money which now goes into the depository at Louisville goes immediately to the United States Treasury at Washington, to remain idle?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know how that is, but it ought not to be so. There ought to be an association of banks which would deposit security with the Government, and the money should be deposited with the banks and only checked out as required; that is what banks are for.

The main objection I have to these subtreasuries is they withdraw money from use, and that is the very thing we are suffering from now. Already $500,000,000 are withdrawn from use, taken right out of the volume of circulating money, the very life-blood of our industries, and locked up, and there it lies idle in the Treasury. Think of it, one-third of the money volume under lock and key in Government vaults.

Mr. McCREARY. How do the subtreasuries withdraw money from use any more than the United States Treasury does?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The more subtreasuries you establish, the more will the money of the people be withdrawn from circulation. If there were no subtreasuries, the money collected from the people and not paid out immediately would be deposited in the banks and become to a large extent loanable capital. It would be where it could be used like other deposits in banks; but when collected by the Government and deposited in subtreasuries it can not be loaned or used, as it would be if deposited in banks, but is completely withdrawn from circulation, as much so as if it had remained in the mines.

Suppose we had a hundred subtreasuries scattered over the United States with, say, a million of dollars in each. What good would it do to scatter the money to be locked up in that way? Would this not necessitate the employment of a subtreasurer and all of the expensive paraphernalia of an office at each place to take care of it? And unless there is to be money to lock up, what are the assistant treasurers for? If there is to be no money to lock up we do not need the subtreasuries and the treasurers and the clerks, and if the money is to be locked up as now, then it might as well be in one place as in a hundred; indeed far better, for it would cost less to keep it in that way. It would cost $10,000 to $20,000 to run each of a hundred subtreasuries a year, while it would cost not one-tenth as much to take care of it all at one or two places. This whole system of multiplied subtreasuries is wrong, and the whole system of hoarding up revenues is wrong. As little money as possible should be taken from circulation, and that, as far as possible, left where it is made available as capital.

Mr. FELTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. FELTON. I am unable to understand how an increase of the subtreasuries will create any greater contraction in the volume of money than if there was but one subtreasury or a dozen. I can understand how if these subtreasuries are distributed about the country where they are needed that they can be of great convenience to the business interests of the country; but where the gentleman's argument comes in I do not understand.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They are not of the least importance to the business interests of the country, not the least in the world. They do not circulate the money at all, and they afford no assistance to any individual, except to those who are employed to take care of the money.

Money that can not be used can do nobody any good. What good can money locked up in vaults in Louisville do anybody there? It might just as well be anywhere else. If it was deposited in banks it might do some good, but none in the world in a treasury vault. And as a subtreasury prevents the deposit of money where it would be held as capital, it does withdraw money from circulation. About that there can be no question.

Now, for instance, as the gentleman will see, if at the city of Louisville instead of taking the money collected and locking it up in a subtreasury it is deposited in some designated bank depository then it becomes a credit at the bank the same as any other deposit; it is a part of its loanable capital like any other deposits for use in the business of the place; but if it is withdrawn from circulation and use entirely and placed in the subtreasury it is neither a part of the circulating medium nor is it capital that can be used. In this way, I say, subtreasuries scattered over the country do harm instead of good, and, besides, they increase enormously the cost of taking care of public money, while the banks will do the business gladly for nothing.

Mr. DORSEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. DORSEY. Is it not true that the national depositories are compelled to put up Government bonds as security for the deposits?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly they are.

Mr. DORSEY. And whenever they have money in excess of the amount allowed to be held on deposit under their bond must they not send the money at once to the subtreasury?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not at all. They are not compelled to send it until it is called for by the Treasurer.

Mr. DORSEY. But he always calls for it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not necessarily; it is wholly a matter of regulation with the Treasury. There is no law requiring it. He may or he may not order it away.

Mr. DORSEY. But does not the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that if they have a hundred thousand dollars of Government bonds deposited as security for the deposits to the extent of $90,000, that they must every day make a statement to the Treasurer of the amount of deposits they hold; and if that amount is in excess of the amount to which they are entitled it is ordered to be sent either to the subtreasury or to the Treasury?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I repeat that is a matter purely of regulation on the part of the Department.

Mr. Speaker, the difference is just this: When once this money is taken from the people and put in an independent treasury and there locked up, it is kept from use as capital or as money; but when it is deposited in a bank it remains a part of the mass of the usable capital of the country. In other words, it retains its place as part of the circulation of the country. For my own part I would carry this so far as to abolish all subtreasuries except possibly one or two. The money that is held in trust to cover certain obligations ought to be in the national Treasury at Washington or the subtreasury in New York, and nowhere else; but it should not be scattered all over the country.

It was not the original intention of the independent treasury that it should be broken up in a hundred parts and scattered all about the country. When the independent treasury was established if it had been thought that it would lead to the establishment of fifty or a hundred subtreasuries to be located in every part of the country with a hundred subtreasurers to take care of the money, I apprehend that there would have been more hesitation in establishing the independent treasury than there was.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I reserve the remainder of my time until this question comes up again.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from the last sitting of the committee.

Insert in line 814:

"Improving the North Forked Deer from Dyersburg to the junction of the South Forked Deer, $10,000."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will hear me for a few moments I think I can satisfy them that this amendment ought not to be adopted. The only estimate that we have received for this river was one made in 1880. There has been no subsequent estimate, and no report in regard to it, since that time. That estimate was for $20,000 for the improvement of 110 miles of the river, which would be for the part involved in the amendment about $2,000.

But the committee, not having any report from the Chief of Engineers approving this project and it not being in the Book of Estimates, did not see fit to allow it.

There was another reason why they did not allow it. There was one great improvement in the State of Tennessee which all her people were interested in. That was upon the Tennessee River, the improvement of the Muscle Shoals. The committee, looking the whole situation over, believed it would be better to appropriate the amount of $350,000 for that great national improvement, and allow some of these small rivers to wait a while, believing it would be best for the interests of Tennessee and best for the interests of the whole country. This river in due time, I have no doubt, will be considered. For the present we ask that the action of the committee be sustained and the amendment rejected.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Tennessee River at Big Muscle Shoals, Little Muscle Shoals, and Elk River Shoals, Alabama: To complete improvements at these localities, $300,000.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In lines 818 and 819, strike out the word "Muscle," where it twice occurs, and insert in lieu thereof "Mussel."

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 821, amend by adding:

"Improving Tennessee River between Florence, Ala., and Paducah, Ky., $75,000, or so much as may be necessary.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I think, sir, that amendment will suggest itself as a proper one to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee of the Whole. From Florence, Ala., to Paducah, Ky., a distance of nearly 300 miles, not a cent is appropriated or proposed to be appropriated for improving navigation by this bill.

The Tennessee River, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to say, is a stream of national importance. It is not a little creek. This appropriation is not for the purpose of building levees and improving private property, but it is for the sole purpose of improving the navigation of that stream a distance of near 300 miles, from Muscle Shoals to the city of Paducah, in Kentucky. As I remarked, not a cent is appropriated for that purpose this year, and there was none appropriated in the last annual appropriation bill.

The Tennessee River is one of the largest and most magnificent streams in the Union, winding its way through Eastern Tennessee, sweeping through North Alabama, and then northward through Tennessee and Kentucky to the Ohio. It floats a commerce second to but few rivers on the continent, and when properly improved by the Government an outlet will be given to the products of this section, and it placed upon a footing with other localities heretofore more fortunate. The Tennessee flows through one of the richest countries in the Union, abounding in iron, coal, and marble, and also in farming lands as fertile as that upon the banks of the Nile. Gentlemen here on both sides of the House who were in that country during the war are familiar with it and know the importance of the proposed improvement, and I am satisfied their good sense and judgment will indicate that this amendment should be adopted.

For the improvement of the Colbert and Reynoldsburg Shoals not a dime is appropriated. And if you make this appropriation for Muscle Shoals, then there are impediments in the way of navigation thence to Paducah. I ask that in all fairness to the Lower Tennessee River this appropriation be made; and I do not believe there is a member on the committee who will oppose it. It is undoubtedly a meritorious appropriation.

Mr. WILLIS. Speaking for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I desire to say that we unanimously oppose this amendment. We have indicated it by our action in regard to the Tennessee River. This action has been taken, not because it is not an important river, not because it is not for the benefit of our constituencies; it affects my own as much as it does the constituencies of my friend from Tennessee, but it is because in looking over the whole position after consultation with the members, and all interested in the rivers of Tennessee, we believed it was to the greatest advantage of my constitutents and my friend's constituents that this great national improvement at the Muscle Shoals should first be opened. In order to do it the engineers said $350,000 would be required. We gave every dollar the engineers asked.

It is a very large amount, and I am sure if my friend from Tennessee had to decide now between an improvement for the Lower Tennessee and for the Muscle Shoals he would promptly say, remove these obstructions at the Muscle Shoals and open this great stretch of river, and we will in the future receive the just consideration for the Lower Tennessee.

Instead of there being unfriendliness to this river the bill itself shows the greatest friendliness to it. I desire to say in behalf of the committee it was not because we did not recognize the importance of the Lower Tennessee, but because we thought the other improvement was of paramount importance that we gave this large sum for the Muscle Shoals. If the gentleman will bide his time after those shoals are open the improvement of the Lower Tennessee will next be undertaken to the satisfaction of his own and of my constituents.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I am not surprised at the action of the committee in the least. The appropriation for the purpose of completing the work already begun at the Muscle Shoals is a proper one and I favor it. The amendment I propose goes further, Mr. Chairman, and provides for the improvement of navigation of the Lower Tennessee after getting through these shoals. Attention was called to the improvement of this river in the early days of the Government, and the importance of the same has increased with the development of the country. It is no answer to the proposition to expend money for a meritorious improvement that it must bide its time until something else is accomplished. Each should stand upon its own merits, and not wait the tardy work upon some other. If it is ever proper to improve the Lower Tennessee now is the time, and those who live upon the lands adjacent to this part of the river and the whole country interested should not be denied justice because, forsooth, other localities must first be looked after. I desire to accomplish that which should have been done long since, and to make the work at Muscle Shoals a grand national success by giving an outlet to the iron, coal, and produce that will pass through this canal, and not arrest it where the improvement ceases. To make the work at Muscle Shoals a success the appropriation of $75,000 that I propose should be expended in removing impediments to navigation between Florence and Paducah.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR, there were—ayes 18, noes 29.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk commenced to read the next paragraph.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before leaving the paragraph for the improvement of Muscle Shoals I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I understand this appropriation in lines 818 to 821 inclusive is to complete that work.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is meant by the report of the engineer in charge, on page 274, where he says:

Amount (estimated) for completion of existing project, $1,437,500.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state to my friend that the work that we propose to complete is the removal of about 13 miles of obstructions at the place known as the Muscle Shoals. As the gentleman very well knows, that is one of the oldest water improvements in the United States, having been in progress since 1836 or 1838. It is an improvement for which the Government gave a large body of land, 400,000 acres, many years ago.

Mr. HEPBURN. And two and a half millions of dollars.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. The work has been pending, not completed; and as the Government had invested so much money on that particular part of the river, the committee thought that in order to get the benefit of the previous investment it was wise economy to appropriate enough to open that portion of the river, because until that is accomplished no further improvement will be of any practical benefit to commerce.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I understand the engineer to say explicitly that to complete this work at the Muscle Shoals and the other shoals named will cost not $350,000, but nearly a million and a half.

Mr. WILLIS. The statement to which the gentleman refers covers the whole river. The improvement for which we make this appropriation is to complete the removal of a particular obstruction. Until that is removed of course the river above and below the obstruction can not be used for continuous commerce, and the engineers state that this appropriation will practically open navigation at that point.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I have an additional amendment which I desire to offer. After the word "dollars," in line 821, I move to add the following words, "of which sum $75,000 shall be used in improving the Tennessee River between Florence, Ala., and Paducah, Ky."

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The section to which the gentleman's amendment applies has been read and passed, and so has the succeeding paragraph.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. We are still on the Tennessee improvement, I believe.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir; that line had been passed and the next paragraph read before the amendment was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I beg pardon of the Chair. I thought we were still on that part of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was simply allowed to ask a question for information.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I was under the impression that we were still on the Muscle Shoals improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that the paragraph which the gentleman proposed to amend has been passed.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. Then I will take occasion hereafter to propose that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] was recognized on the paragraph preceding the one just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair recognized the gentleman at that time.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment in line 823. I move to strike out the word "five," in that line, and insert "ten;" so that the paragraph will read, "Improving South Fork of Cumberland River, Kentucky: continuing improvement, $10,000."

Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose is a little one, a very modest one, considering the importance of that river, and I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the very next paragraph of the bill there is an appropriation of $250,000 for a river no larger than the South Fork of the Cumberland; yet that appropriation is none too large; it is needful and proper. This South Fork of the Cumberland River is a long river, and there is a vast amount of produce carried upon it. The people there raise corn and wheat and other valuable products which they want to send to market. Some of the finest timber in the world grows upon that river. Not only that, but some of the best coal is found there, but it remains in the bowels of the earth because there is no way of transporting it to market, no means of getting it out.

Now, sir, this bill carries on its face over $15,000,000—more money than would pay the cost for one year of the Blair bill for educational facilities which our children need so much. I do not oppose this bill, for I am not like some men here—I believe that our Government is able to educate the children, and able to improve the rivers, and able to pension the soldiers, too—a thing that some gentlemen seem to doubt very much. I believe the Government is able to do all that, and therefore I am not opposed to this bill; but, carrying as it does such a large amount of money, certainly that money ought to be equitably distributed. I do not object to any appropriation that is made in the bill. As I have said, the appropriation for the improvement of the Kentucky River is no larger than it ought to be; but we are not prepared, on the South Fork of the Cumberland, to have a great appropriation like that now, because the work has not been started there as it has been at other places. But if you give us $10,000 now, instead of $5,000 (and surely no reasonable man can object to that), the river will be cleaned out and a large amount of transportation will be done upon it, a great commerce will begin to float upon it, and in the course of time, when the world sees and when Congress sees that it is necessary to appropriate more money to still further improve that fine river, then we shall come here and get something like $200,000, which is what we ought to have. Just now, however, as I have said, we are not prepared to use that amount, because there have been no locks or dams constructed on that river, and all we want now is to have it cleaned out, so that we can at once get the benefit of the commerce that can be carried on without those great improvements, which must ultimately be made. I ask the gentlemen of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to consider this question a moment. Five thousand dollars, of course, is a mighty little thing to put upon a bill that carries on its face over $15,000,000.

Although the amount asked is small, it is a great thing to us in our country, for that mountainous region suffers for want of transportation facilities. The mountains are high, the roads are bad, it is difficult to haul any distance. An appropriation of $5,000 to be expended upon the banks of the river would be a great help to us; and it does seem to me when gentlemen think of the matter there can be no objection to this proposition. With this appropriation we can commence a system of improvement that will be a great blessing to our people, and nobody will suffer any disadvantage. I hope the House will seriously consider this proposition and adopt it.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has referred to the next paragraph of the bill, which provides for an appropriation of $250,000 for the benefit of the Kentucky River; and he remarked that if this amount is allowed for the Kentucky River there ought to be an appropriation of $10,000 for the South Fork of the Cumberland River. There is a very decided difference between these rivers. The Kentucky River is the longest river in Kentucky; and while I will say at the outstart I have no objection to the amendment proposed by my colleague, yet I feel it my duty to speak in behalf of the amount proposed to be appropriated for the Kentucky River.

That river flows for over 100 miles through the district I have the honor to represent on this floor. That river and its tributaries drain thirty-two counties of the State of Kentucky, and a majority of the counties drained by it are filled with inexhaustible quantities of coal and iron. The State of Kentucky has more square miles of coal land than any other State in this Union or any other single country in the world. The State of Pennsylvania has 12,630 square miles of coal land, and the State of Kentucky has 13,000 square miles of coal land.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I ask that Alabama be excepted.

Mr. McCREARY. I except no State, because I know whereof I speak when I say the geological reports of the various States in the Union will show that Kentucky has more square miles of coal than any other State in the Union, Pennsylvania not excepted. England has 6,029 square miles of coal land, and Kentucky has twice as many square miles as England.

Her vast coal fields are divided into two divisions, known as the eastern and western divisions. The eastern division comprises 10,000 square miles of coal land. It is this eastern division the Kentucky River and its tributaries drain.

The finest cannel coal district in the world is in the vicinity of the Kentucky River. While cannel coal is found in other parts of the world in pockets, the cannel coal on this river and its tributaries is found in great continuous veins from 4 to 7 feet thick.

In the counties of Morgan, Wolfe, and Breathitt, in the district represented by my friend and colleague [Mr. TAULBEE], are veins of cannel coal from 5 to 7 feet thick.

In coking coal the counties on the upper waters of the Kentucky River excel almost any other part of the country, there being in that part of the State three times as much coking coal as is found in any other State of the Union.

Iron ore of the very best quality is found in great abundance in the counties drained by the Kentucky River. For car-wheel purposes, and for steel rails, and for cutlery, the iron of that region is not excelled. For years there has been a demand for it at Sheffield, in England, where it is used in manufacturing fine cutlery. That country also has splendid forests——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I hope the committee will give me one moment more to conclude my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the hills and valleys of many counties about the headwaters of the Kentucky River are covered with magnificent forests which make the very best lumber. In some of these counties you find timber in its pristine loveliness, almost untouched by the ax of the woodman. There are on the headwaters of the Kentucky River thousands of acres of white pine. Last year there were shipped down the Kentucky River, even with the present facilities for transportation, over 2,000,000,000 feet of lumber.

The people of that region need an outlet. No friendly railroad has been extended into that section. The only outlet the people have is the Kentucky River. They must ship their iron and coal and lumber down that river in order to find a market.

Four locks and dams have been built on this river and two are now being built with money appropriated by Congress, and the proposed appropriation, which has received, I understand, the indorsement of the entire Committee on Rivers and Harbors, gives to the Kentucky River $250,000 to continue that much-needed improvement. No person who is familiar with the facts can doubt the necessity for this appropriation. It will be a great benefit to a large scope of country and a blessing to many people.

Mr. WOLFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. WOLFORD. I only wanted to say a few words more.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. WOLFORD. My friend and colleague certainly misunderstood my remarks. I did not mean to say the appropriation for the Kentucky River was too much. I only wished to present the matter in this view: It is true in the blue-grass region of Kentucky there is more wealth than south of the Cumberland River. But my idea is the Congress of the United States ought to be just, as well to the poor as to the rich.

Now, while you can get along, and I do not object to your having everything you want—there is no objection whatever; the committee has reported yours already, and I say it is right—but at the same time here is a poor people living in the mountains who need this improvement and need it badly. They have better coal than you have, they have better timber, they have more and better cannel coal, they have everything that you have; and here upon the South Fork of the Cumberland River is as good pine as yours, and our cedar is better. They have everything that can be demanded that commerce needs. Now, the question for Congress is while they are carrying a bill with $15,000,000 for the benefit of the whole country—and it will be of a great deal of benefit—and I am for the bill and expect to vote for it, although some of it may be wasted, but not a dollar can be wasted upon the South Fork of the Cumberland River. It will be only the entering-wedge of an improvement which will be a great blessing to the people. It is not, however, all that they ought to have; but we are willing that this work shall begin even in this small way; and this is a very poor people who have nothing, while your people are rich and have everything.

Now the question is, Will you vote everything to the rich and nothing to the poor? Will you give this $15,000,000 to people who are apparently in need of it, or will you give it to those who are already rich and whose commerce does not demand it? While I shall vote for the bill, believing it to be right, still I insist that there should be some consideration shown to this class of the people. We only ask $5,000 more to put their river in a fix that it will be a blessing to the community. Now, I do not wish to detain the committee. I do not wish to say anything further upon the proposition. I am satisfied that the committee who reported the bill believed that they were doing right to the entire country. But I do not think they have given enough to that region. I am satisfied there will be no effort to reduce the appropriation for my friend here on the right, and therefore I want you to come and help me. You have all you want.

Mr. McCREARY (from his seat). I am for your improvement.

Mr. WOLFORD. Very well; then come and help me to get it. We are poor, and we need this little sum very badly. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, it is with very great diffidence that Kentucky again comes to the front [laughter]; but in behalf of the committee I desire to submit very briefly the reasons why this amendment should not pass. We are governed by the estimates of the engineers, and the estimates of the engineers for the Cumberland River—the South Fork—were for $10,000. The committee has given $5,000, and that $5,000 stands to-day as a monument of the persuasive eloquence of my gallant colleague on this floor General WOLFORD.

We recognize that that part of the country is cut off. It is called the "Cut-off," in fact, and it needs access to the rest of the world. We have gone to the extreme limit of the bill in regard to that improvement. I regret it could not have been more, but, voicing the sentiment of the committee, I think it is as large as, within the limits of the bill, could possibly have been given.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WOLFORD it was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 38, noes 67.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should be glad to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for the purpose of asking some information upon this point. Will he tell the committee the cost of this work up to this time, if he can do so, on this Kentucky River? The report of the engineers does not state it.

Mr. WILLIS. The report does not, as far as I can now see, disclose the exact cost. I should say, however, that it was in the neighborhood of $700,000. That is my recollection.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the cost of the four dams on that river?

Mr. WILLIS. My recollection may not be correct, but that is my impression at this time. I refer to the amount expended by the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. My recollection is that it was in the neighborhood of a million of dollars.

Mr. WILLIS. Nearly $2,000,000 have been expended by the State on this river.

Mr. HEPBURN. In addition to the $700,000?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; but my friend will understand not by the Federal Government. The State expended this amount and turned it over to the Federal Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I understand that what has been expended upon these four dams is in the neighborhood of $3,000,000, and it is estimated that it would take two and a half millions more to complete it?

Mr. WILLIS. Not quite that; somewhere in the neighborhood.

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply wanted the House to understand what this improvement was to cost, namely, some $5,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman does not mean the committee to understand that the Federal Government paid out all of that?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. Only some three and a half or possibly four million of dollars.

Mr. WILLIS. Three million of dollars would cover the entire cost to the Federal Government if it is fully improved to the extent of the recommendations, which we do not expect.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate for the purchase of the works of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company, situated on the Green and Barren Rivers, in the State of Kentucky; and in order to ascertain the value of said works the Secretary of War shall appoint a commission of three competent engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who shall value and appraise the same, and report to the Secretary of War; and if the said Green and Barren River Navigation Company shall offer and bind itself to take for said works a price deemed by the Secretary of War to be satisfactory and not excessive, he shall so report to the Congress at its next succeeding session; but if the said Green and Barren River Navigation Company refuses to sell its works, or demands a price deemed to be excessive, then the Secretary of War shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to institute proceedings for the United States for the condemnation of said works, and shall report the result of said suit to the next Congress for its action, to the end that the navigation of the said Green and Barren Rivers may become free.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a point of order against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is proposed by the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 846, before the word "Congress," strike out the word "the."

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection this merely formal amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order against this paragraph. I turn to the rule, subdivision 8 of Rule XI, and find this:

Subjects relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

I suppose that committee has jurisdiction to report upon matters that will be covered by the language of that rule. I turn to the engineer's report and I find that this paragraph of the bill provides for the purchase of private property by the General Government, not for the improving of the river, but simply to take the property which belongs to a navigation company, their locks, their water ways, that property upon which, and for transit through which, and over which, they to-day collect tolls.

Now, I insist, Mr. Chairman, that that subject, the purchase of property in that way, is not covered by this rule giving jurisdiction to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. If this provision is held good in the bill, I certainly see no reason why the provision in regard to Hennepin should not be added to the bill.

Mr. PETERS. Or the Erie Canal.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes. As is suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, why a provision could not be added to this bill for the purchase of the Erie Canal. I accept his suggestion as illustrating my argument. Here is a private corporation—with whose works the Government has never had anything to do—organized, I think, under a charter from the State of Kentucky. At all events the work was originally done by the State of Kentucky. I am right, am I not, in this?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors this work was accomplished by the State of Kentucky, as canals have been by some States, not by all; and they have ceded this work to private parties. And now we find in this bill a provision to purchase this property—property, I suppose, which the State gave away. We find a provision to purchase that private property by the Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will not that improve the navigation of the river?

Mr. HISCOCK. I presume not. I do not see that the navigation will be improved by the Government making this purchase of private property.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It will release the tolls.

Mr. HISCOCK. That does not improve the navigation.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The purpose is to get rid of the tolls.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know that. But here what Congress is asked to do is to buy this work. That is the proposition.

Mr. WILLIS. My friend, in his first proposition, is mistaken. This is not a proposition to buy these works. Nowhere in this proposition is a committal of the Government to purchase these works. This simply asks a report by a board of engineers as to their value to be made to the next Congress.

If this passes it does not commit Congress to their purchase and it does not purchase them. There is nothing in the paragraph to be criticised in that way. It simply provides the engineers shall report to next Congress for its action what the value of these works is.

The history of this work, I may briefly state in connection with the point of order, I read from the official document. Nearly fifty years ago the State of Kentucky constructed these works on the Green and Barren Rivers at an expense of $1,000,000. A few years ago the State handed them over to a private corporation by a lease, and that corporation holds now these works. The works themselves, except what little repairs have been put on them, belong to the State of Kentucky.

The object of this provision is to remove that obstruction to free navigation. The State of Kentucky, by a recent act of its Legislature, has given over absolutely as a gift to the Federal Government these works, provided this lease can be gotten out of the way; so that it is for the use of the river, for the free navigation of the river, that it is necessary to remove this lease.

But let me say, as a matter of information to those who have not read the bill, that this does not propose that this Congress shall buy it. This simply provides for a report to the next Congress for its action. Even should the engineers report that Congress could buy it for a dollar and a half, there is nothing in this clause that would commit Congress to the payment of a dollar and a half. If there is, I shall accept an amendment from my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]—a proviso that nothing in this act shall commit Congress to the purchase of these works. The report of the engineers will merely bring before the next House information as to the obstructions in two of the great navigable rivers of the country. That is all I wish to submit on the point of order.

Mr. BEACH. How long is the lease to run?

Mr. WILLIS. Thirteen years.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to speak briefly to the question of order without making any suggestion as to the merits or demerits of the proposition.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. This very question was decided on Thursday by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole in connection with the proposition as to the Monongahela River. I suppose the same decision will be made now, and it is hardly necessary to consume time on a point of order which was thoroughly discussed and settled on Thursday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This, as I understand, is a new question of order, although I confess it is a question which, it seems to me, does not merit much discussion. All the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is fixed by the rule cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and it simply provides where a bill is introduced or a resolution relating to the improvements of rivers and harbors that that bill or resolution shall, as a matter of order, go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

But that is not a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. My answer to the gentleman, therefore, is in the nature of two propositions. First, there is no limitation in that rule upon the power of the committee to report legislation; and, second, by the precise terms of this provision of the bill it does relate to the improvement of rivers and harbors; or at all events there is no such affirmative showing that it does not so relate as to authorize the chairman to make a parliamentary ruling to that effect. That question will arise upon the merits of the appropriation itself. Therefore I claim that the point is not well taken.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the question.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I have nothing to say.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one single suggestion in reply to the portion of the argument made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], in which he said that this provision does not authorize the purchase of this work, that it does not authorize the expenditure of a dollar of money. If that be so, then I would like to know how the improvement of a river or harbor is involved in it.

Mr. WILLIS. The object is to bring the facts before Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. Here is, for aught we know, legislation proposed simply to acquire information on a certain subject, which I suppose it is proper enough to have, but then it does not improve any river or harbor.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will pardon me, this provision in its present standing in the bill is simply in the nature of a survey, an estimate, nothing more.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I understand that to be so.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, all the surveys are on the same footing.

Mr. HISCOCK. The surveys are in reference to the improvement of some river or harbor.

Mr. WILLIS. So is this.

Mr. HISCOCK. Here is simply an inquiry in relation to private property.

Mr. WILLIS. But inquiry in relation to that as affecting the navigation of a river. If, however, my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] thinks, so far as the substance of this provision is concerned, that there is any clause in it which commits the Government——

Mr. HISCOCK. I make no point against the clause upon its merits. My point is that it does not come within the jurisdiction of the Rivers and Harbors Committee to report here a proposition—I do not say purchasing, but looking to the purchase by the General Government of purely private property, the work of a State accomplished by the State and donated by it to private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this question the Chair thinks that the propriety or impropriety of the purchase ultimately is not to be taken into consideration by the Chair, but is a question purely for the House. It is admitted here that this is a natural river—a navigable river. Work has been done upon it by a private corporation, locks, dams having been constructed at which tolls are charged. It is designed to remove the obstruction which that private work makes. The Chair is of opinion that it is within the scope of a river and harbor bill to provide for inquiring into the question how the obstructions can be removed and what that work would cost. The Chair therefore thinks the point of order is not well taken, but leaves to the House to determine as to the propriety of the provision in the bill.

The Chair is strengthened in this view by the fact that an analogous question was decided by the then occupant of the chair, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], upon the paragraph of the bill beginning at line 457, providing for the improvement of the Monongahela River. In that case the point was overruled and the section declared in order. The Chair is also advised that a bill has heretofore been introduced and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors looking to the identical purpose embraced in the paragraph now under consideration. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, commencing in line 835, down to and including line 855, and in place thereof insert the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate for the purchase of the works of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company, situated on the Green and Barren Rivers, in the State of Kentucky, and the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company, situated on the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania; and in order to ascertain the value of said works the Secretary of War shall appoint a commission of three competent engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who in each case shall value and appraise the same and report to the Secretary of War, who shall report to Congress at its next succeeding session. And the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this provision: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as committing Congress to the purchase of said works."

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this subject-matter has been so fully discussed heretofore that I do not think it necessary to say anything about it now. This is simply a provision instructing the Secretary of War to ascertain and report.

Mr. EVERHART. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "works" the words "and the franchises and property connected therewith."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. EVERHART was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to call for a division of the question, so that the motion to strike out and the motion to insert may be voted on separately?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted; and I trust that the proposition in the text of the bill will not receive the favorable consideration of the Committee of the Whole. It seemed to me, sir (although the discussion of that question is not now proper), that it was scarcely possible to present a proposition involving the power of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to incorporate a subject into this bill of more moment than the one presented by the point of order just decided. Here is a proposition to purchase the property of a private corporation—an artificial highway created under the laws of a State, only incidentally connected with a navigable river, not itself a navigable stream, and that, too, for a special speculative purpose; and yet it is an amendment to a bill to improve the navigable rivers and harbors of the United States.

Mr. BAYNE. Of what river does the gentleman now speak?

Mr. HOLMAN. I speak of the Green River and other rivers named in the amendment.

A MEMBER. It enters the Ohio River.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that all of these streams finally enter the Ohio River. But the State of Kentucky on the one side and the State of Pennsylvania on the other, with complete acquiescence on the part of the Federal Government, have assumed that these streams were not navigable streams within the meaning of the term as used in defining Federal power and are not under Federal control; that their improvements have been and are purely local enterprises. As such they have been treated heretofore both by State and Federal Governments; streams having no interstate or navigable character, but made artificial channels of local trade, it is proposed that the Federal Government shall purchase such local property as this now and make such local artificial channels a part of the systems of navigable streams under Federal control.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is a mere inquiry.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend says it is a mere inquiry. But what is the necessity of inquiring into the subject with a view to purchasing unless the purchase be really contemplated?

Mr. NEGLEY. Well, let us have the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. And is it not well known in the current history of Congress that when a step of this kind is once taken, if the subject involves a sum of money, a report upon the subject made by a commission is absolutely certain to be carried into effect? When has such a scheme ever failed?

This Committee of the Whole did not hesitate to vote down the Monongahela proposition when it stood alone. When the great coal field which invokes Federal aid to add to the wealth of a few gentlemen stood by itself you defeated it. Now it is sought to give it strength enough by combining it with a corporate interest in Kentucky to carry it through. Can that be done? In other words, will this committee consent that a measure which when standing alone is defeated shall by being connected with another measure of exactly the same general character receive its sanction? Is this legislation proper or tolerable even on a river and harbor bill?

Mr. BAYNE. I beg leave to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will excuse me; I have but a few moments. The one scheme was fittingly characterized as the most audacious that ever came into this House. I am not able to find a term to characterize the other, because I am not sufficiently informed of the corporation involved in the other enterprise. But here is a proposition in the one instance at least to contribute as an ultimate result several millions of dollars from the public Treasury to develop the wealth, according to the statement of my friend from Pennsylvania, of a comparatively small body of men owning these imperial coal fields, and under the guise of public improvement. This question is connected closely with the great conflict between capital and labor which the legislation of the last twenty years has brought upon the country.

Mr. SOWDEN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen profess to deplore the fact that during recent years overgrown fortunes have grown up in this country through the aid of special and class legislation—through the opportunities offered by acts of Congress, not through patient industry or natural channels; yet the very proposition now pending as to the Pennsylvania proposition alone, taking the statement of my friend from Pennsylvania as to the vast wealth of these coal fields to be increased and developed, presents a more stupendous increase in the individual fortunes of a few citizens than any former attempt of Congress to open up opportunities for the aggrandizement of the wealth of the few at the expense of the Treasury filled by the labor of the whole people. Who are to be benefited by this purchase of an artificial channel of trade? The whole people? No, sir.

These vast coal fields described a few days ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are owned by a few gentlemen—it would be interesting to know who they are—and their wealth is being developed by a body of men living in cheerless homes, impoverished, hopeless, and miserable. These owners already rich are to be made the possessors of colossal fortunes through the encouragment and agency of Congress. An act of Congress is to add enormously at the common expense to estates already great, and yet gentlemen profess to deplore the misfortune that has fallen upon the country in colossal fortunes which have already reduced vast numbers of our people to hopeless poverty—great estates on the one hand, wretchednees and poverty on the other as the natural fruits of this class legislation.

I am not able to say that as to this scheme to purchase from a corporation the Green and Barren River improvement made under the authority of Kentucky such result is to follow; but I question the policy of such a purchase, I doubt the constitutional power of Congress to make it; but if there ever was a proposition brought into Congress covertly or openly to build up the fortunes of the few at the expense of the whole people, it is the proposition to purchase this property of the Monongahela River corporation at public expense for the benefit of the owners of these great coal fields. No stronger statement of the case can be presented than that which was presented by my friend from Pennsylvania a few days ago, in which he so eloquently depicted the imperial wealth involved.

The effect of the measure is to advance the interests of men who already have large estates. Why should they be favored? At best partial interests always exist in this bill strongly enough. But to go to the extent proposed in this measure and two or three other paragraphs of the bill—directly to build up favored interests—is a policy which ought now to come to an end. It ought never to have been commenced.

Mr. BAYNE. I am sure my friend from Indiana misapprehends the situation. Does he believe that the owners of the navigation company own the coal?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I know they do not. I know the object of this whole movement is for the benefit of the owners of those extensive coal fields to which the gentleman has referred, and the measure is to add to their wealth. This proposition is not in the interest of the consumer, not in the interest of any large body of the American people, but in the interest of the owners of that vast wealth of coal lands, and who ask that the public wealth shall enlarge their estates. It is proposed that the Federal Government shall buy out the property rights of a private corporation at the expense of several million dollars, and give the owners of these coal fields unobstructed access to the markets. Will it cheapen coal? No, for the demand and competition fix its value.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that the tolls charged upon the coal are a burden upon the consumer and do not benefit the producer?

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that if you appropriate the millions involved in this proposition it will not cheapen the coal in any market. The owners of these coal mines will sell their coal at no less price than other owners of coal mines who have received no bounty from the Government.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How do you know that?

Mr. HOLMAN. It will not to any extent increase competition. Coal will sell at the best price the owner can command. It will directly operate to the benefit of the persons for whom, at the public expense, you open up an unrestricted channel to the markets. Why should they not incur that expense when they alone are to be benefited?

Mr. WILLIS. Let me state to my friend from Indiana, if he will permit me, that here is a letter from the president of the Board of Trade of Louisville, in which he says it would save them $50,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very likely he is a stockholder. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. No, I beg your pardon; he is not. And the gentleman has no right to make any such statement. That gentleman never saw these works, and is as little interested in them as my friend from Indiana himself. He has no authority for the statement which he has made. I shall append the letters to which I have referred. They are as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., February 23, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 19th instant, and beg to thank you for your promptness. Referring to the resolution of the board of trade asking that the navigation of the Monongahela River be made free, I desire to impress upon you the importance of this matter, not only to Louisville but to all points on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to which Pittsburgh coal is shipped. As I understand it, under the present state of affairs the embargo amounts to a tax of about one-half a cent per bushel on every bushel of coal which comes from that region. The consumer, of course, in the end pays this tax. I presume it costs Louisville some $50,000 a year. If you desire it, I can send you correct statistics showing just what the consumers of Pittsburgh coal have to pay by reason of the navigation of the Monongahela River not being free.

I notice the digest which you have forwarded has your name on the same. I trust this book has cost you nothing, but if it has you will kindly let me know what it is and I will be glad to refund the same. The book, as you doubtless understand, is for the benefit of the board of trade. I desire to secure for the board of trade all public documents which are sent out free and which may be of interest to its members. Please let me know if it will cost me anything to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sent to me daily as it is issued.

Yours, truly,

HARRY WEISSINGER.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS, Washington, D. C.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PITTSBURGH,

DEAR SIR: It was my privilege to be present at yesterday's session of Congress during the discussion of the river and harbor bill, and especially that portion of said bill which referred to the purchase of the Monongahela slackwater improvement. I write to thank you for the favor which you personally extended to this measure, and especially your timely explanation of the fair and honest efforts of the friends of the measure. I am sure there was no purpose or desire to in any way wrong the corporation.

I beg to assure you and also the committee that there is but one sentiment in this entire community upon this matter, and that is that the Monongahela River ought to be free. The entire press of the city, indeed of Western Pennsylvania, is a unit in favor of such a measure. Even the corporation itself admits that our claim is just and that the interests of the entire valley demand that the Monongahela River ought to be put on the same footing as the Kanawha. But the owners of the slackwater got the idea that an undue advantage was sought to be obtained by the provision of "seizure." I am quite certain that nothing of the kind was intended. I would not be a party to any unfairness or intentional misrepresentations. I am gratified that all the statements I made before your committee have been confirmed and not a single averment has been questioned.

I hope before Congress adjourns some measure may be passed which will secure the appointment of a commission of competent engineers to examine the condition, &c., of the improvement, with instruction to report to the next session of Congress.

Again thanking you for your able support of our just claims, I am,

Most respectfully,

JOHN F. DRAVO.

Hon. A. S. WILLIS,
Chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, living as I do at the head of slackwater navigation of Barren and Green Rivers, I wish to submit a few thoughts to this House on that matter. I am somewhat familiar with the condition of those rivers and the country through which they run.

In 1841 the State of Kentucky completed locks and dams on Green and Barren Rivers at a cost of about $860,000. They opened slackwater navigation from the city of Bowling Green, Ky., to the city of Evansville, in the State of Indiana, a distance of about 200 miles. Ever since there has been open transportation of commerce at all times of the year, and the fact is, as shown by the report of the engineers, those rivers are rarely frozen in winter. They are often navigable when the Ohio River is frozen.

These rivers, Mr. Chairman, and their tributaries drain about 10,000 square miles, and in that vast area are included some of the finest coal and iron fields, according to the geologists of Kentucky, which can be found anywhere in the United States.

A moment ago I stated this system of locks and dams was completed in 1841 by the State of Kentucky, but in 1868, for some reason unaccountable to the people of Kentucky, and especially unaccountable to the people of that region through which these rivers run, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky leased these valuable improvements of slackwater navigation to the Green and Barren River Navigation Company. From that day, sir, a blight fell upon the commerce of that country.

The State geologist of Kentucky has made a report in reference to the navigation of these rivers and the condition of the country they drain. I desire for a short while to call the attention of members to it, because there is a disposition, and I am proud of it, on the part of the Congress of the United States to improve rivers and harbors generally. There never was a time before in all our history when it was so necessary this should be done, and for a number of years past Congress has recognized the importance of making these improvements.

We have railroads in every section of the country, and wherever they have had it in their power to do so they have monopolized the traffic and increased very largely the cost of transportation.

It has become a crying necessity, therefore, by improving our rivers and harbors, to create such competition throughout the country as to compel these railroads to reduce their charges and afford greater and cheaper facilities than before.

Now, sir, let us see just exactly what is the condition of the country which these rivers drain. I will read to the House, if I am permitted, the letter of the State geologist of Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will be glad to yield the floor, if I can be recognized hereafter.

Mr. HALSELL. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

When my time expired, Mr. Chairman, I was about to read the report of the State geologist of Kentucky in reference to the condition of the country through which the Green and Barren Rivers run. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE KENTUCKY GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Frankfort, Ky., March 15, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request that I give you a statement respecting the resources of the Green River Valley, I submit the following:

The resources along Green River, Kentucky, are of such a character as to warrant the assertion that if the river was opened to commerce untrammeled there would rapidly follow a large industrial development along its valley, and important contributions would be yearly added to the commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Green River is navigable, by reason of locks and dams, at all seasons of the year for a distance of 215 miles above its entrance into the Ohio. Boats drawing 4 feet of water can go up to the head of slackwater navigation at all seasons when the dams and lock-pits are in good repair; and I have been informed by river pilots that boats can navigate this river during extreme dry seasons that are too large to cross some of the bars in the Ohio River. I have seen Green River free from ice in midwinter, when the Ohio River would be closed to navigation by ice above Louisville. The drainage from a large area in the Green River Valley is subterranean, and in midwinter these underground streams, with a temperature of from 52° to 59°, are discharged into Green River, so that it is seldom obstructed by ice. These advantages—deep channel, long pools between dams owing to the slight fall of the river, steady flow of water in summer, and freedom from ice in winter—added to the advantage of traversing a region abounding in coal, iron ore, timber, building stone, and fertile soil, with the liberal administration adopted by the United States Government on other rivers applied to this, will in a few years cause it to be one of the most important tributaries to the wealth of the great Mississippi Valley.

This river, penetrating through the center of the western coal field of Kentucky, has along its banks, above the water level, a variety of coals of excellent quality. The principal coals are the main Nolin coal, of Edmonson County (the lowest coal in Western Kentucky), from 3 to 5 feet thick. The Mud River coal (probably the same as the main Nolin), located near the head of slackwater on that stream, a coal well known for its good quality. A barge-load of this coal was taken to Saint Louis some years since and tried very successfully in one of the Kingsland (now Vulcan) Company's furnaces. Coal No. 9 is 5 feet thick in Muhlenburg, Ohio, and some of the adjoining counties; coal No. 11 is 6 feet thick on Green River, and coal No. 12 varies in thickness from 2 feet to 6 feet. Some of these coals have, in years past, obtained high reputations in the markets of the Lower Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. That they are favorably situated along the river for cheap mining, and can be delivered in large barges on the Ohio at the mouth of Green River at seasons when the Upper Ohio is not navigable, should certainly lead to a large development of coal mining along the river.

I know of no region richer in coal-measure iron ores than the valley of Green River. These ores are thick, easily mined, convenient to coal, and are equal in quality to coal-measure ores found elsewhere, where there is now large development in iron manufactures, with transportation facilities inferior to those of this valley. These ores occur principally in Muhlenburg, Butler, Edmonson, and Grayson counties. In this statement brief mention can only be made of a few of the principal iron ores. The ridge extending northward from Green River for 20 miles, between Bear Creek and Green River, contains several beds of ore of workable thickness and good quality. The principal bed is regularly stratified, and is from 3 feet to 5 feet thick over a large area. It contains, as shown from analyses of carefully averaged samples:

	No. 1.	No. 2.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Metallic iron	42.31	40.48
Alumina	4.83	6.71
Lime carbonate	1.21	.29
Silica	22.40	14.34
Water	10.29	12.18
Phosphorus	.28	.41

No. 1 is from an opening known as the Fedine bank, 4 feet thick, a few miles north of Green River. No. 2 is from the same ore, 5 feet thick, 6 miles north from No. 1. Many years ago there was a small charcoal furnace on Nolin River; the pig-iron made at this furnace was a cold-blast iron of great strength and toughness.

The following is an analysis of this iron:

	Per cent.
Iron	94.287
Graphitic carbon	3.100
Combined carbon	.700
Silicon	.493
Phosphorus	1.029
Sulphur	.012
	99.611

Some of the ores in this region could doubtless be used successfully for making steel by the Basic process.

In Muhlenburg County, near slackwater navigation on Mud River, there is a stratified iron ore from 3 feet to 6 feet thick. This is the same ore as the Edmonson County ore, of which analyses are given above.

This ore has—	Per cent.
Metallic iron	45.10
Alumina	6.98
Water	12.31
Silica	14.20
Phosphorus	.39

On top of No. 12 coal, in Muhlenburg County, it is a "Blackband" iron ore from 12 inches to 14 inches thick.

An average sample from this bed gave the following:

	Per cent.
Metallic iron	44.13
Alumina	5.29
Water	12.43
Silica	17.25
Phosphorus	.06

In Butler County, near the mouth of Little Reedy Creek and near Green River, is an ore showing on the outcrop 3 feet thick.

Analysis from averaged samples gave the following:

	Per cent.
Metallic iron	33.63
Alumina	8.17
Water	9.75
Silica	31.90
Phosphorus	.15

That furnaces along Green River can depend on a reliable supply of cheap and good iron ore there is no question. In addition to the large deposits of ores contiguous to the coals, the excellent limonite iron ores from the Cumberland River can be delivered to furnaces on Green River at a reasonable cost. These ores have from 45 per cent. to 52 per cent. of metallic iron, and some of them run as low as .07 per cent. in phosphorus. The high-grade ores from Iron Mountain district of Missouri would cost less delivered to furnaces on this river than to the furnaces in the Upper Ohio Valley, where much of this ore is now used. Thus it will be seen that cheap and pure ores are accessible along Green River, and that with the combination of coals, ores, and very pure limestone there should be a large development of iron manufacturing in this valley.

Connecting, as this river does, with the great system of water ways of the Mississippi Valley, the production of cheap iron ore will be of great benefit to the consumers of iron in the entire valley. The extensive forests of valuable timber along the river, the quarries of fine building stone, the clays and other resources to be developed, together with the fertility of the soil, give assurance that the opening of this river to free navigation will bring about an industrial activity widespread in its quickening results on the commerce and trade of the entire country.

I regret that the scope of this communication precludes me from entering more into details respecting the resources and possibilities of this favored region.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN R. PROCTER, State Geologist.

Capt. JAMES C. POST,
United States Engineer Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have read this letter to show the resources of this Kentucky region.

What has been the result? Those rich ores of iron and coal have remained undeveloped in the bosom of the earth from the beginning of time, and they will remain there forever undeveloped if we are to depend upon the navigation company which now holds a monopoly of this slackwater navigation. That navigation company has established such enormous tolls as practically to prevent the development of that whole country, and unless something is done by the Government of the United States for better communication and safer and cheaper transportation, the resources of those rich valleys will remain forever undisturbed. Therefore I trust the day is not distant when the Government of the United States will take charge of these works and relieve the people from the unjust exactions under which they now suffer.

The Legislature of the State of Kentucky at its present session (it is now in session), recognizing the propriety and importance to the commerce of the country that the Government of the United States should have control of the navigable waters of the country, passed an act ceding to the General Government the property rights and franchises which she has upon condition that the lease which the Green and Barren River Navigation Company has shall be extinguished either by purchase or condemnation. The question for the consideration of this Congress is shall the Secretary of War be authorized to ascertain upon what terms the lease can be purchased. I ask, sir, is it not a matter of sufficient importance to warrant this House in giving such authority? I most respectfully submit that it is, and I am sure that the Congress of the United States, when the report is made and the lease can be purchased from said company at a just and reasonable amount, will open the rivers to free navigation, and destroy the monopoly which has so long crippled commerce and prevented the development of that region of country so rich in mineral wealth and possessing most wonderful agricultural capacities. If the Government would get control of those rivers and navigation, free to all, immigration will be attracted to that region, and it will be in a few years densely populated by industrious and energetic communities, and vast wealth will be extracted from the bowels of the earth.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has characterized this proposition as an effort to create great personal fortunes for a few owners of coal lands in the States of Kentucky and Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I can not yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. But certainly the gentleman can not desire to misstate me.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If I have not stated the gentleman's position correctly I yield for correction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I applied that to Pennsylvania alone, for in reference to the State of Kentucky I said distinctly I did not know.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Now, the gentleman can see in this proposition only the owners of the coal fields of Pennsylvania. He can not see a very much larger object, to wit, the millions of consumers of coal in the great valleys of the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio Rivers, to whom the question of cheap coal is a most vital one. I stand here to speak for these consumers of coal, and to protest in their names and on their behalf against anything like monopoly on these rivers which levies toll on the coal these consumers need and must have in their every day industries. The great bulk of the coal used by the consumers of the West and the South comes from the State of Pennsylvania, and in part from the State of Kentucky. Tributary to these rivers, the Monongahela, and the Green and Barren Rivers, are the exhaustless coal fields which supply this coal.

Years ago private enterprise improved these rivers, which were then and are now navigable water ways of the United States. What is proposed now, sir, is simply an inquiry on the part of Congress as to what steps may and should be taken for ridding these rivers of the monopolists, in whose grasp they have been held, for the benefit of the whole country; and I must confess that I am somewhat astonished to find the gentleman from Indiana, who has made a record on this floor as an anti-monopolist, standing here to-day to plead the cause of the corporations who hold these rivers and their commerce in bondage.

There is nothing in this proposition, sir, which is intended absolutely to commit Congress to the purchase of these works. It may or may not lead up to that.

If Congress has the right to open the Muscle Shoals of the Tennessee River or the Cascades on the Columbia River in Oregon and make them free to the commerce of the country, why is it that we can not buy out improvements which have been already put there by private parties on other rivers which come within the designation of "navigable water ways" of the United States? To ascertain whether it is advisable to do that is the pending proposition, pure and simple; and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I may say here, has the concurrence of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. We are willing to accept the proposition he advances in the shape of an amendment, so that there shall be included also in the inquiry the Monongahela as well as the Green and Barren Rivers. All this, I repeat, is in the interest of the consumers of coal.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, nothing has surprised me more or pained me more in this whole discussion than the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has now rushed into the arena as an apologist for and assistant to the power of the great corporations of the country. I would not be surprised after what has just happened if he should be found opposing the interstate-commerce bill that will be brought in here by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], for I say to him that neither that bill nor all of the other interstate-commerce bills that can be concocted will have so much to do with the reduction of freights upon the railroads of this country as the getting rid of the tolls that are levied upon the commerce that seeks transportation upon river highways.

Why, sir, if it were not for the lakes and rivers of the country the freights on the railroads would be infinitely higher than they now are. You could multiply them by three or four times their present rate and then would not satisfy the railroad corporations if they were not kept within bounds by water-way competition. Tolls upon commerce that floats upon our water ways is just what the railways most desire. Only make your tolls high enough, and the managers of railroads will laugh in their sleeves while we appropriate money to improve rivers and harbors.

Tolls are odious, especially if levied upon commerce that floats upon the highways that God has given us. There is nothing that so embarrasses the commerce between the States as tolls levied upon it, no matter whether levied by railroads or navigation companies. The theory of protection in this country is against tolls upon interstate commerce. The theory of protection would levy tolls upon international commerce and give us the most absolute freedom of commerce between the States.

There is no danger whatever of monopoly in manufactories of any kind in this country if you will have free commerce between the States. There will always be competition enough to make iron cheap, for instance, if you will allow the coal and iron to go from the State of Alabama into the State of Pennsylvania, if it will go there, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] told us the other day it would if you will only take off your tolls. Just make the rivers free, and the question of cheap transportation is solved at once.

Mr. LAFFOON. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to take any part in the discussion of this measure. This bill which is presented for our consideration, in the line of the improvement of rivers and harbors, presents the matter in such a spirit of fairness, that I had not thought it possible there would be a solitary objection. It has never been within the scope of my limited discrimination to draw a line between buying the franchises of a private corporation, and thus opening a stream to commerce, and investing millions of money to improve and bring into commerce the traffic of other rivers. I have not been able to discover the distinction between the effect of giving hundreds of thousands of dollars to lock and dam rivers that are unnavigable, and to buy outright from private corporations streams which are already locked up and improved by their monopolies.

Green River flows 215 miles of navigable water. And since 1868, let me say to this House, that with all the immense wealth that is embedded along its banks and growing in the shape of timber there is not a vessel that does not belong to this monopoly permitted to float upon its waters.

There have been speeches made on this proposition on behalf of the consumers of coal. These speeches meet with my absolute approbation. I look to the opening of the streams of the country with the view of seeing materials of every character cheapened, and living made more cheap, and the people made more happy thereby.

But while I am on the floor I desire to talk for those poor people whose resources lie locked up by this immense monopoly. We have tried by other means to deal with this terrible anaconda that wraps its folds around our wealth; we have applied to the courts; we have tested the constitutionality of the law in the courts of the States and the United States; and in all this litigation the result has been that their chartered privileges have been declared superior to the rights of the people.

With all this in view, at the meeting of the last Legislature in Kentucky the whole property in this river was ceded to the Government of the United States, trusting in the magnanimity of the Federal Government, and hoping that this Congress would come to the relief of the people, and not only relieve the poor consumer, but unlock the resources of that coal country to the commerce of the world. While it would enrich those from whom it went, it would also enrich those to whom it came.

With this view of the case I hope this House will not consent to see this Congress pass without giving some sort of legislation that proposes relief to the people who live along Green River in the State of Kentucky.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman to make it fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of gentlemen on this floor who seem to be very much disturbed because those who oppose this amendment have suddenly become the friends and champions of monopolies. I would like to know in whose interest is this proposed amendment with reference to the Barren River and the Green River. I call your attention to the fact that a few years ago the State of Kentucky discovered that it had an elephant on its hands. It had a partially completed improvement.

Mr. WILLIS. And it would be glad to get it back.

Mr. HEPBURN. Allow me to read from the report.

A MEMBER. State its substance, so as not to consume your time.

Mr. HEPBURN. This river was not profitable. It was a constant source of embarrassment to the State, and finally it succeeded in finding a corporation that would take charge of it.

The report shows that it is an expense of $12,000 a year for that corporation; that the income is from $7,000 to $11,000 a year.

These gentlemen have discovered that they have an elephant upon their hands and they now propose to dump it upon the Congress, and the friends of this amendment are the men who are aiding this monopoly in getting rid of a piece of property unremunerative to them.

I want to call attention further to the fact that this improvement is valueless in its character. The dams are wooden. They have been in use for very many years. The report shows that the land sides of the locks are all either falling in or by the land pressure are displaced from their proper position.

The next thing for us to do will be to make large appropriations for the improvement of this now worthless work. Besides, this corporation, notwithstanding their desire to be relieved, propose to ask $400,000 for the privilege of being relieved from their white elephant.

As regards the other proposition, that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], I will say that that corporation spends an averrge of $72,000 each year, and has done so for the last eleven years, in the maintenance of its works. I am told by gentlemen conversant with the facts that 95 per cent. of all of the commerce of that river or of all that passes through this improvement is that of a dozen canal-owners in the city of Pittsburgh. They are the gentlemen that are to be relieved of their tolls—2½ cents a ton and 4½ cents a ton. That is the relief. It does not amount to anything in effecting the cost of the coal to the consumer. But it amounts to $168,000 per annum, or 95 per cent. of that, to these half dozen men in whose interest my friend from Pennsylvania is now so zealous.

Is it the policy of Congress, in the interest of these twelve men, to expend from three to five million dollars in the purchase of this property and then to expend annually $72,000 in its maintenance, to say nothing of the salaries that would have to be paid in order to save an average of less than 3 cents per ton.

A MEMBER. Do you speak of the amount of toll for each lock or for them all?

Mr. HEPBURN. For them all, where the great bulk of the coal comes through—2½ cents and 4½ cents; 4½ being the maximum.

Now, I hope we will hear no more from gentlemen about the opponents of this amendment being the friends of the monopolists and being instigated in their hostility by a peculiarly friendly feeling for that class of persons.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The gentlemen who have been engaged in the discussion in opposition to this amendment and to the original clause in this bill seem to me to indulge not only in some bad language, but also in very bad logic. Surely the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] understand that the manufacturing business of this country, in any section of it, is owned by a few men, and when any gentleman undertakes to address an intelligent body like this American Congress, and to proclaim that the development of any great interest only inures to the benefit of a few, he does himself great injustice. As to these coal fields along the Monongahela River and along the Green and Barren Rivers, are not the gentlemen aware that not a single bushel of that coal can be dug without the employment of labor, that that industry employs large numbers of laborers, that the few men of whom they speak as owning the coal lands and getting all the benefit employ those laborers, and that those laborers feed other thousands, the members of their families? Are not those gentlemen aware that every bushel of this coal that goes out into market helps to feed the fires of innumerable furnaces, which help to support large numbers of the American people? It is a poor argument for gentlemen to undertake to say here that because the improvement of a navigable stream will help one or two enterprising men in any given neighborhood, therefore there should be no improvement at all.

I undertake to say that it is as much the duty of the American Congress to make any given improvement of our navigable waters if the neighboring property is owned by one single individual as if it were owned by a million of people. It is not the number of people who own the furnaces, it is not the number of people who own the coal fields that determines the question, but it is the benefit that the furnaces and the development of the coal fields will bring to the whole country. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] knows that the coal that is dug out on the banks of the Monongahela is carried down and goes to keep life in the furnaces along the Ohio and the Mississippi and up along the Missouri, and helps to make that great valley the teeming hive of industry that it is. I say the argument of these gentlemen is a poor one, one which does little justice to the subject or to themselves. Why, sir, we are told here that nothing should be done for this stream or that stream because some man or men may receive benefit from the improvement.

I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if the General Government ever spent a dollar in his State that some individual did not receive the benefit of it? You might as well say that you will not build a public building in any State because, perchance, the Government will have to buy the site of that building from some individual who may make a dollar or two from its sale. You might as well say that there shall be no improvement made along the Ohio River, because when you make such improvement, and thereby increase the facilities for trade, every town along the river and every individual in that town receives some of the benefit. For what purpose are these improvements made? Are they not made to improve the condition of the people along the borders of these streams and other navigable waters? Can you make an improvement that will not do good to somebody? If there is any improvement that will not benefit anybody it ought not to be made, and the narrow-minded, selfish policy of saying that an improvement shall not be made because perchance some enterprising citizen in the neighborhood will be benefited is really unworthy of discussion.

Gentlemen have referred to the labor troubles that are now rife. There is not a gentleman in this House but knows that the manufacturing interest of this country has been, and is being, bled to death by the excessive tolls that are demanded by monopolies and corporations. There is not a gentleman in this House but knows that if there could be a more unrestricted interchange of commodities between the States, with a less tax in the way of charges for transportation of those commodities, there would be more left for the benefit of the laborers and greater general prosperity.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want only half a minute to say to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that he is entirely mistaken. I have not the time now to read, but I will put in the RECORD the facts in regard to this Green and Barren River improvement, and will show that instead of its being a "white elephant"——

Mr. REED, of Maine. Had not we better have the facts before we vote?

Mr. WILLIS. My friend will bear in mind that we are not now proposing to purchase this improvement. I desire to say to the gentleman that the tolls there amount to $50,000 per annum and the net result to the company is $38,000 per annum. That is the report of the engineer. He says:

It results in a total tax of $50,000 upon the present commerce of those rivers. Estimating the total value of the commerce at $6,000,000, it is a tax of five-eighths of 1 per cent. upon the value of every article passing through the locks.

The State of Kentucky did not give up this work because it was a burden. I can not go into the history of the matter now, but I have the report here.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to read three lines?

Mr. WILLIS. I have the report here. The statements you are about to read are positively denied by the authorities. They assert that the State records show that at the time of the lease it returned to the State treasury $45,000 above the cost of maintenance.

I yield now the balance of my two and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is entirely mistaken in his diagnosis of this case. It is not a dozen men that own this.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is my information.

Mr. BAYNE. Then your information is incorrect, and the men who give it misrepresent the truth.

This property is owned by hundreds and hundreds of people. There are farmers owning coal land there which they have not yet sold. It is true there are some extensive operaters owning large bodies of coal land, but the great bulk of it is owned by a great many people. Let me give some statistics of the freight passing upon this Monongahela River:

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia in eloquent terms has informed this Committee of the Whole that the effect of this proposal to buy out this private highway for the benefit of 830 square miles of coal lands will be to cheapen coal in the markets. This might be true if this were the only coal going to the markets which it seeks; but when it is borne in mind that this coal and vast bodies of other coal enter those markets, the proposition is simply absurd. Does the gentleman say that the owners of those 830 square miles of coal deposits will sell their coal cheaper in the markets than the other producers of coal? No, the price will be the same. The consumer will derive no benefit from these millions which it is proposed to take out of the public Treasury for the benefit of this great coal monopoly on the Monongahela River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to read just three lines from the report of the engineers.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEPBURN. I read from page 1907 of the engineer's report:

An act to incorporate the Green and Barren River Navigation Company.

Whereas the Green and Barren River line of navigation has always been a charge upon the State, and is now largely in debt, and without prospect of any better condition; and whereas, &c.

[Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, that is the way they humbugged the Legislature and got the charter.

Mr. EVERHART. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order now to move an amendment to strike out the entire paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, but an amendment to that amendment would be in order.

Mr. EVERHART. I move to amend so as to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That proposition is embraced in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. EVERHART. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is to strike out the paragraph and insert other matter which has been read. If the motion to strike out and insert should be defeated, then a motion simply to strike out would be in order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE, there were—ayes 63, noes 42.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BAYNE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 52.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is proposed, if unanimous consent be given that a vote by yeas and nays be taken on this proposition in the House, that no further count be insisted upon.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that a yea-and-nay vote be taken on this question in the House. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered. On this question the ayes are 90, the noes 52; so the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend by inserting, after line 855, the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a joint committee of eight members of the next Congress be appointed, to consist of five Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate. Said committee shall confer with a committee of like power appointed by the Legislature of the State of New York, and with the governor and other State officers of said State, in regard to the maintenance of the canals thereof, and ascertain if said canals are sufficient for the requirements of interstate commerce, or if they should be enlarged, and the cost of such enlargement; and said committee shall ascertain upon what terms and conditions the United States can acquire the title to and jurisdiction of said canals, or of any of them. Said committee is authorized to appoint one of its members chairman, and may hold its meetings at such times and places as it may appoint in the State of New York or the city of Washington, and to take testimony, and employ a clerk, who shall be a stenographer. The expenses of said committee shall be paid from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress, to be disbursed therefrom upon the order of the chairman of the committee and of two other members, one of whom shall be a Representative and the other a Senator; and said committee shall report in writing to the next Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point of order this is not germane to the present paragraph and is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. As it relates to the purchase of canals, it belongs more properly to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly see what could be more germane to the pending paragraph, which provides, as I understand, for the negotiation and purchase of property belonging to private individuals, known as the Green and Barren River Navigation Company. In this same bill an amendment of a similar character has been adopted in reference to the purchase from private individuals of property of the Monongahela Navigation Company.

The proposition I submit is similar in its character. One of the canals referred to in it involves the navigation of the Oswego River. Not only that, but of the navigation of Lake Champlain as well as the navigation of the Mohawk River are included in it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let me suggest a further point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is it?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It directs the action of the next Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as that is concerned, I will say it was copied from a joint resolution heretofore offered, and can be modified to provide for investigation by this Congress, which will relieve it of the gentleman's objection and point of order.

As I have already said, I can hardly see, Mr. Chairman, what amendment can be offered to this bill more germane to the bill, and certainly to the paragraph under discussion, than the one I have proposed.

Mr. CANNON. From the point of order made against the proposition of the gentleman from New York, and the distinction taken between his amendment and the paragraph of the bill and paragraphs of a similar character which have been already passed upon, I have come to the conclusion there is a real distinction, and it is this, that if the gentleman had the River and Harbor Committee to lay its hand upon his proposition and bless it, it would then be in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman's argument means I am not right in offering my amendment because the organization referred to by him is not back of it. Is my proposition to be defeated for that reason? [Laughter.] I hope such will not be the case, but that the question may be disposed of upon its merits.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the point made by the gentleman from Illinois is not altogether correct. He said there was no power of organization behind the gentleman from New York. Is there not the power of organization behind him of always opposing these river and harbor bills?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not opposing the river and harbor bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is this not a piece of your opposition to the improvement of the Western water ways?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have never made any opposition to improving Western water ways.

Mr. GKOSVENOR. Is this not a piece of your constant opposition to improving all our rivers? Is that not your reputation?

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Ohio knows I have no such reputation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood such to be your reputation for a great many years.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can say to the gentleman from Ohio I have voted for all except two river and harbor bills since I have been in Congress. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he means to say it constitutes opposition to the bill to criticise its provisions or to antagonize portions of it looking to the purchase of private property? If he does, then he is welcome to put me in that category. I have never been opposed to a proper river and harbor appropriation bill. I have never been unfriendly to a proper measure looking to internal improvements. I come from a great State which has always been in favor of internal improvements.

Mr. GROSVENOR. O, yes! the gentleman is in favor of internal improvements to run upon wheels. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman will read my short history, he will find his statement to be incorrect in reference to my opposition to internal improvements. I did in the last Congress oppose with all the ability I had the so-called Mississippi River improvements, and I have no regrets on that point. I insist my amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Let me ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of the purchase of the Erie Canal by the Government.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. I desire to make another point of order upon the proposition of the gentleman from New York: That is, that we are dealing now with this river and harbor bill in the Committee of the Whole, and, therefore, that the point of order he made is not so broad as if dealing with some subject in the House.

Dealing with this subject in Committee of the Whole the authority of the committee is as limited as it would be if the river and harbor bill itself were pending before the committee to whom the subject is committed; and therefore this proposition relating to the improvement of a canal belongs to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and comes properly before that committee, not being a subject within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I may perhaps revise my judgment of the motives of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to attempt to attach to a river and harbor bill a proposition to buy a canal in the State of New York. But it looks to me, however, as though the gentleman from New York will be shut up hereafter to the conclusion that he is in favor of the proposition he makes; and that when he makes a record he will be bound by that record, but not compelled to say that he was in favor of the amendment which he himself proposed. Now, if he is in favor of the amendment, does he not know that the amendment, if by any possibility it could be adopted, would destroy this bill? And does he think that the men upon the lakes in the Northwest, the men upon the line of the Ohio River and the men upon the lines of the other great water ways engaged in the transportation business or in commerce in this country, do not know their enemy when they meet him in broad daylight? Does he think he can stand up here for the purpose of ridiculing or loading down a bill of this character by an amendment assailing the purposes of the bill, and escape afterward by saying that his record has always been in favor of public improvements? [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not; let the gentleman take his own time; let him take his own course. Let him tell me now that he stands ready to break down the demands of the people of this country to improve their navigable water ways.

This Committee on Rivers and Harbors have petitions signed by more than half a million of the laboring men of this country asking that this appropriation of money for this purpose shall be made. We have petitions from the great mercantile and commercial associations of the Northwest, and all along these great lines of water transportation, asking for the passage of a bill like this. I do not object to criticisms of items of the bill; but when the gentleman attempts to put into it an item which he knows will destroy it, I want him to take the public record he himself has made, and a year from now, or two years from now, stand up to that record and say that he did attempt to defeat an appropriation for the improvement of the water ways of the country. [Applause.] That is what I want him to do, and that is the necessary and inevitable conclusion from what the gentleman is now doing; for he shall not carry water here upon both shoulders, especially upon a question of the improvement of the water ways of the country.

Mr. HISCOCK. All I desire to say to the gentleman—the schoolmaster from Ohio—is that whatever record I make for myself I shall always stand by; that so far as my record in the past is concerned in reference to internal improvements I stand by it to-day; and if it has reached the point that a proposition simply looking to the creation of a committee on the part of Congress to investigate only—for no more is asked—the question of this purchase; not to purchase, but simply to investigate the question and report its views to this House as to whether it is in the interest of the internal commerce of the country that certain canals shall be acquired; I say that if a proposition of that kind is so pretentious and so potential in its effects that it can defeat the river and harbor bill, then I give notice to the gentleman from Ohio that I will in the future accept my record upon that question also.

If a bill is to come in here that can not safely carry a proposition simply looking to the investigation, and nothing else, of an important subject, that provides for the appointment of a committee of the House and of the Senate to collect facts and bring them here before Congress and the people, depending upon the question of the policy or the propriety of the Government acquiring this great water way through the State of New York—if such a proposition will load down this bill so that it will suffer defeat, I say I am willing to accept all the consequences, disastrous as they may be in the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, and nevertheless offer it for the adoption of the committee.

I offer it in the face and eyes of the power that the bill also carries, the two provisions—the purchase of private property, the purchase of one canal actually and in fact a canal of the State of Kentucky—a canal that the State of Kentucky is willing to give away, that it did give away, alleging that it was entirely worthless to the people of that State, and they were willing to give it to private parties if they would only take it; if, I say, a bill can carry a proposition of that kind to take this worthless property, and I presume the gentleman from Ohio was in favor of it—property held as worthless by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky—and yet can not carry a simple proposition to investigate in reference to one of the greatest economic questions that can come before the people of the country, and if the bill shall fail because of that proposition—I do not believe it would fail with it—I shall be willing, I say to my friend, to stand by the record I make upon that question, whether it be one, two, three, or four years hence.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the committee that the pending question is on the point of order. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do. The point of order made by the chairman of the committee is that the proposition is not germane to the pending paragraph or to the bill.

This proposition provides for the acquirement of a canal. The claim is that this is a bill relating to rivers and harbors, and that canals are excluded from the class of water ways to be benefited by it.

Now, the paragraph beginning with line 818 provides for the improvement of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals. There the Government is building a canal 13 miles long and a second canal several miles long, I do not know quite how many.

Then the paragraph "for improving the Falls of the Ohio River at Louisville, Ky.," beginning with line 828, has sole relation to the enlargement of a canal. That entire improvement consists of the building of a canal and the necessary locks and dams.

The paragraph commencing with line 856 is as follows:

Improvement of the Muskingum River, between Zanesville and the mouth of the river and for operating the same, $20,000. And the United States hereby accepts from the State of Ohio the said Muskingum River improvement, and all the locks, dams, and their appurtenances, and the canals, belonging to said improvement, and all the franchises.

I need not read further. Thus, Mr. Chairman, we find that three different canals are provided for by this bill; so that it ought to be called a bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors and canals. Canals are as essentially a part of the subject-matter of this bill as are rivers and harbors. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is solely with reference to the acquirement of a fourth canal. Can it be claimed that this is not germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to decide the point of order. The purpose of this bill, as stated in its title, is to make appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors. The purpose and object of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is to appoint a committee to investigate the capacity of canals in the State of New York, &c. The Chair thinks that the object and purpose of this amendment is not within the scope of the bill, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. EVERHART. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. BAYNE. What paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph as amended.

Mr. BAYNE. I raise the point of order that that motion is not in order. That has just been voted on, and the paragraph can not be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not a simple motion to strike out. It was a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. BAYNE. I understand the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] is to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has been amended. The Chair thinks the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order; that is, to strike out the paragraph as amended.

Mr. BAYNE. It has not been amended. There was a paragraph stricken out and another inserted. The paragraph inserted was not amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that to strike out and insert is an amendment. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] proposes to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. BAYNE. Can he strike out what has just been inserted when that has not been amended or changed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order, and will submit it to the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the Chair allow me to submit one more point? Unanimous consent was given that a yea-and-nay vote should be taken in the House on the paragraph.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That would be nugatory if the paragraph should be stricken out.

Mr. BAYNE. The fact that unanimous consent was given, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] assenting, excludes him now from moving to strike out that paragraph. The motion was made to strike out and insert, and the paragraph inserted in lieu of the one stricken out has not been changed or amended. In my opinion the rules would preclude the motion to strike out now made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART].

Mr. WILLIS. As it is now twenty minutes after 5, and as the Chair may wish to look further into this question, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I am notified by a number of gentlemen that they desire to speak on the river and harbor bill and other matters. I ask unanimous consent that a session of the House be held to-night for debate only, giving preference to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BYNUM. I object.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House take a recess till 8 o'clock to-night, the evening session to be for debate only.

The SPEAKER. The latter part of the motion is not in order. If the House takes a recess, business, under the rules, will be in order. There may, however, be an understanding by unanimous consent that the evening session shall be for debate only. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 65, noes 54.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OHIO SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the clerk of the house of representatives of the Legislature of Ohio, transmitting testimony taken by a select committee of the house of representatives of Ohio and the report of that committee as to charges against the official integrity and character of certain members of said house of representatives in connection with the election of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE as a United States Senator.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. President, no formal motion is required, I believe, to send these papers to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I desire to be considered as making such motion if it is required, and to couple with it the request that the minority report may take the same course, a copy of which I submit.

With this formal disposition of the matter I am at present content; but desire to make a short statement to accompany the papers into the hands of the committee.

A Democratic caucus for nomination of a candidate for United States Senator was convened at Columbus on the evening of January 8, 1884. I was not in attendance, but without doubt the contest was heated and bitter. The result of the first ballot was as follows:

Booth	1
Pendleton	15
Ward	17
Payne	46

Being a majority for the successful candidate of 13 over all.

The papers submitted embody the results of an investigation into this canvass, conducted secretly for more than three months by a committee of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio.

The resolution under which the committee was appointed provided that—

> Whereas the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette of date of January 12, 1886, contains a printed statement, on the authority of S. K. Donavin, alleging grave charges against the official integrity and character of certain members of this house * * * so definite and precise in statement as to call for immediate action in order to vindicate the reputation of members of this house:
> Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into all the facts of the charges so alleged, &c.

The scope of the investigation, as actually conducted by the committee, is stated in the majority report as follows:

> Whenever our attention was called to anything which indicated the probable employment of improper means to gain support, we followed the clews presented on the theory that we were not only authorized, but in duty bound, to pursue any matter that promised even remotely to show the use of such means in connection with the election, because the discovery of one important fact, although having no immediate bearing upon the charge against the persons named in the resolution, might lead to the discovery of facts having such bearing.
> And furthermore, and upon the same theory, our inquiries were not confined to the technical rules of legal proof, but the committee availed itself of any source of information—admitted hearsay statements and even the opinions of witnesses.

I had hoped that the request put forward by the minority members of the committee that the proceedings should be open and public would have been acceded to, and that I might have been spared the misrepresentations of the testimony which for three months have been so studiously circulated, and against which I have, of course, had no defense.

THE RESULTS OF THE INVESTIGATION are now here, embodied in the majority and minority reports:

First. No mention whatever is made in the majority report of Mr. Donavin, but in the report of the minority is found the following:

> After weeks of delay Mr. Donavin appeared before the committee and testified that he knew of no fact of bribery or no act on the part of any person toward any other person, either directly or indirectly, to improperly influence them as members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly in their support of Henry B. Payne; he knew of himself of no facts upon which he based said article, but gave as his principal authority one William A. Taylor, who testified, when called, that he had no knowledge of any act of any person toward any member of the house or of the senate of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of bribery or corruption used to induce that person or persons to give their support to Henry B. Payne for United States Senator.

Thus fell all that the investigation was originally based upon.

Second. The reports specifically, and in terms, exonerate fully and completely the four members named in the resolution under which the committee was appointed.

Third. As to myself the record is one of absolute and specific exoneration. Immediately upon the appointment of the committee I addressed a letter to the chairman containing the following request:

> For myself I invite and challenge the most thorough and rigid scrutiny; my private correspondence and books of account will be cheerfully submitted to your inspection, if you desire it. I only insist, in case any testimony is given which in the slightest degree inculpates me, I may be afforded an opportunity of appearing before the committee.

To which in due time I received a reply containing the following promise on the part of the committee:

> If, in the prosecution of this inquiry, any testimony tending to inculpate you in any degree with any questionable transaction be received, I assure you that your request to appear before the committee in such event will be most cordially and fully acceded to.
> THOMAS A. COWGILL, Chairman.

As the committee have never notified or requested me to appear before them, nor called for my books or private correspondence, the result of the investigation, except upon the hypothesis that the committee are destitute of truth and honor, must be as to myself absolute exoneration.

I refrain from any comment upon the facts stated in the minority report, that witnesses desired by the minority were not subpœnaed; that respectable persons, whose names had been by some gossip implicated in alleged scandal, were refused an opportunity of testifying; and, further, that the majority refused to meet as a committee for the purpose of discussing the evidence or applying any rule to the same whereby a unanimous report could be reached.

Fourth. The committee after having exonerated, as it was obliged to do, all persons charged in the resolution and myself, transmits the hundreds of pages of gossip to the Senate without making any request of this body.

The resolution says:

> For the information of the body of which Senator PAYNE is a member and for such action as it may deem advisable.

Of course I have no knowledge of the contents of the testimony. The members of the house who voted to send it here had no knowledge, it having been all taken in secret session by the committee and the house having voted down the motion to have it printed or read. It must, however, be supposed to be fairly represented by the contents of the majority report, which I have read; and judging from that, I characterize this proceeding—the transmission of the testimony here—as an attempt to circulate and give currency to baseless gossip and scandal after everything substantial in the way of a charge has been discredited and disproved.

I am content to leave the matter with the Committee on Privileges and Elections for such disposition of it as they may find to be in accordance with dignity and justice. I trust that it will receive early attention and action.

I have here, Mr. President, the letter which I wrote to the committee, the answer of its chairman, Mr. Cowgill, and the report of the minority of the committee; and I ask that they may be referred and disposed of with the other papers by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the papers referred to, together with the papers presented by the Senator from Ohio, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Thomas C. Clark, of Peacham, Vt., son of Thomas Clark, deceased, a Revolutionary soldier, praying for such legislation as will bring him within the provisions of the Revolutionary pension act; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the committee of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, praying that an appropriation of $5,000 be placed at the disposal of the Commissioner of Agriculture for investigating the nature of the diseases of fruits, fruit trees, grains, and other useful plants due to parasitic fungi; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Sisters of Charity of St. Rose Industrial School, of the District of Columbia, praying that an appropriation be made to aid in the enlargement of that institution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of Grange No. 16, Patrons of Husbandry, of New Jersey, praying for such legislation as will afford protection to the dairy interest of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of Grange No. 16, Patrons of Husbandry, of New Jersey, remonstrating against the admission free of duty of wool and other agricultural raw materials; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPOONER presented the petition of G. M. Woodward and others, citizens of La Crosse County, Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of such laws and the making of such appropriations as will enable the National Board of Health to employ all the power and resources of the Government, which can be so lawfully exercised, in the prevention of epidemics, and to prosecute investigations, the results of which tend to the improvement and preservation of the public health; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Cohoes, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of dairymen and others, of Pittsfield, N. Y., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1837, to prevent the illegal sale of all imitations of dairy products; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Harry H. Enders and 18 others, members of George B. McClellan Post, Grand Army of the Republic, No. 332, Department of Michigan, praying for increase of pensions to ex-Union soldiers, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Marysville, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Denver, Colo., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred petitions of the National Cotton Exchange of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Va., in relation to increased appropriations for additional cotton stations for observations of the Signal Service, to report the same back to the Senate. From a communication of the Secretary of War, it appears that these appropriations have been estimated for in the estimates of the Department, and I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1411) granting to the Hanson and Atlantic Beach Railway Company the right of way through the military reservations at Saint Augustine, State of Florida, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1493) for the relief of Col. Jesse H. Strickland, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1112) granting a pension to Phœbe H. Meech; and

A bill (S. 2159) granting a pension to Mrs. Almira Ambler.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2152) to amend chapter 218 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, approved June 15, 1882, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 437) for the relief of the legal representatives of Maj. Matthew Smith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 2256) to create a port of delivery at Lewes, Del.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2257) granting a pension to Mrs. Janet L. P. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2258) to increase the pension of James E. Gott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 2259) to increase the pension of Thomas Chapman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2260) for the relief of Mary Swift; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 2261) for the relief of R. R. Tinsley and Miss Eula E. Henry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 2262) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 2263) granting a pension to Col. James H. Blood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2264) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MARIE HOLLANDS.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Marie Hollands.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That WASHINGTON C. WHITTHORNE be, and he hereby is, appointed a member of the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Pensions, and the Committee on the Tenth Census; and that he be appointed a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to serve in the place of Mr. CHARLES W. JONES during his present temporary absence from the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CLERK TO THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, for the residue of this present session of the Senate only, at a salary of $8 per day; and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay the said salary out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ordinarily I should ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time, but as I have always thought that such resolutions ought to go, as the rules provide, to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, I shall ask that reference. However, I wish to say to that committee, as I may not have time to see them personally, that the business, at this particular session, of our committee is unusually large, there being more than one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty bills and other legislative subjects sent to it at the present session and a very large number of other subjects, much larger than ever before, to which I can not otherwise refer than in a general way; and we think it essential to the public interest to have additional assistance. Although ordinarily I should ask for the present consideration of the resolution, I think it better that it should go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate under the rule.

EXTENSION OF EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1868) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion.

Mr. McMILLAN. I gave notice on Thursday last that at the conclusion of routine business this morning I should ask the Senate to take up the bridge bills reported from the Committee on Commerce. However, if the bill of the Senator from Vermont will not take much time I may yield for that.

Mr. MORRILL. It will take but a short time to dispose of the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will yield for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1868) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion. It proposes to appropriate $300,000 for the purpose of erecting an extension of the Executive Mansion on the south of the present structure, of equal and similar exterior character, and connected therewith by a corridor, substantially in accordance with the plan on file in the room of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with such modifications as may be approved by the commission hereinafter provided.

Section 2 directs that the sum shall be expended under the direction of a commission, consisting of the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, who shall have authority to select the best and most suitable material to be used in the construction of the extension as aforesaid, and to make contracts, so far as may be deemed expedient, for its completion.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that a similar bill passed four years ago unanimously with no negative vote, and the necessity for it is certainly as great now as it was then. Those who are familiar with the house know that the President has but six rooms outside of the breakfast room for his own use; that the servants of the Mansion have to go out to find lodging; and that the lower part of the building is unhealthy, not properly drained. I may say that the bill receives the approval of the Executive now as it did four years ago.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not quite ready to vote for the bill. I acknowledge that the present condition of the Executive Mansion is unsatisfactory; the President is being pushed farther and farther westward in the upper story, and but a fraction of the building really is left for private uses; but I should be very sorry to see that building turned into a mere collection of offices adapted merely to business purposes because of the historical associations connected with it, and because I think the building as it is is a very creditable one indeed. So far as the criticism is made against it, that it is not well underdrained, I think that can be very easily corrected. I supposed the evils there had been remedied; certainly a remedy is within easy reach anyhow.

It is perfectly apparent that the business of the President ought to be done outside of that building; but I would much rather myself vote for a proposition to erect a building of reasonable size and convenient arrangement just west of the Executive Mansion and upon Sixteen-and-a-half street, if that be the right number, which separates the grounds of the Executive Mansion from the State, War, and Navy building—easily accessible upon that street to the public who come to the President for business purposes and easily accessible from the White House for the President and his subordinates. I think that would be much better than to attempt to duplicate the building south of the Executive Mansion. Then the present mansion would be left entirely to the Executive, which would be then sufficient, as I have always been told, if they could have the entire possession and control of it.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course the Senator from Connecticut is entitled to his opinion. I can not think, however, that he has so thoroughly investigated this subject as it has been investigated from time to time by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who are unanimously in favor of the bill; and so far as it has been submitted to members of the Senate it has received almost the entire approval of the Senate.

The building as it now stands will not be touched; it will remain to be occupied mainly for executive purposes. Of course the East Room will remain for receptions, and the large, long corridor connecting with the southern building, of the same style precisely, will afford almost as much room for persons who are at public receptions as even the East Room and the present corridor.

I may say that it is unjust to any President we may have that he should be confined to this single building, not able to retire when the hours of business close, but he is there from half past 9 o'clock frequently until 11 o'clock before he can get rid of all of his visitors. It does seem to me that it is time that something should be done.

The idea of buying a new site and building a residence for the President right alongside of the present Executive Mansion I do not think will meet the approval of anybody except the Senator who has suggested it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator entirely misunderstands me. I never suggested buying another foot of ground. I wish that the President may have the entire occupancy for private purposes of the present building, and that the public offices shall be turned out, and a building, which need not be a large one to accommodate them, be erected just west of the present building, on what is public ground upon Sixteen-and-a-half street, within 75 feet, or 150 possibly, or 200 feet it may be, of the present building, which would be perfectly accessible to the public for business purposes, and leave them no excuse for crowding him in his private mansion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. According to the notice which I gave I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bridge bills on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills providing for the erection of bridges, reported from the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the first bill of that character on the Calendar will be announced.

ROUND VALLEY INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will yield if it will not lead to discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I will make a statement. There is a bill upon the Calendar which, if it does not lead to any discussion, I ask the Senate to lay aside the pending order temporarily and let it be acted upon. It is a bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have received information from the Interior Department that it is highly necessary that the bill should be acted upon. Indian business is fixed for a particular day elsewhere, and unless the bill goes through then it will lose all possibility of action at this session of Congress. If it causes any debate I shall withdraw it instantly. It is Order of Business 219, reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but he requested me to call it up.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it will not lead to discussion I yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. If it gives rise to discussion I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that pending the execution of the order in regard to the bridge bills the bill indicated by him shall be considered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I reserve the right to object if it leads to discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I am subject to the Senator's demand,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1101) to provide for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Round Valley reservation, in the State of California, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN DALLAS, TEX.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to yield for one moment longer. I desire to call up House bill 2410, which will cause no discussion whatever. It is simply to place a third story on a public building now in the course of construction, and the work has been stopped until the passage of this bill. It is imperative to have it done.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it will not take any time I do not object.

Mr. MAXEY. It will not take two minutes to pass it, if the Senator will give me that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to add a third story to the public building in the city of Dallas, Tex.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose named in the preceding section there be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of $25,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLAMETTE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 697, being the bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR KANSAS CITY.

The bill (H. R. 1360) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 10 miles below and 5 miles above the city of Kansas City, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR COUNCIL BLUFFS.

The bill (H. R. 3369) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to an error in the bill. In section 3, at the end of line 3, the bill reads: "that a bridge built to such plan."

Mr. MCMILLAN. It should read, "according to such plan," I presume.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be, "built on such plan."

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is a House bill, and there is evidently a misprint there. Let the bill be corrected according to the engrossed bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be corrected according to the House engrossed bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4569) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected either in the counties of Clay and Jackson, in the State of Missouri, or in the county of Clay or Platte, in said State, and the county of Wyandotte, in the State of Kansas, and to make the same a post-route.

Mr. ALLISON. I find in section 4, beginning in line 4, the following language:

Upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers and freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge.

I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he understands that the parties constructing this bridge will be obliged to do it as a part of their railway, charging no more for passengers and freight per mile than they are allowed to charge upon any other mile of their railroad. These bridges are generally expensive structures. I merely ask with a view of ascertaining the character of this bridge when constructed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose the construction of the bill would be a matter of judicial determination. By the language here used I suppose this bridge would be a part of the entire route of the road.

Mr. ALLISON. And the company can make no special or separate charge for the use of this bridge?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I presume that would be so.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I desire to ask the Senator what is to be understood by section 6, which provides—

That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 4 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

Those seem to me to be two clearly inconsistent provisions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; that refers entirely to an agreement between separate companies, where one company desires to use the bridge erected by another company. This proviso, of course, qualifies the rule as to arriving at the agreement between the two railroad companies. The other provision refers to the charges for freight and passengers.

Mr. ALLISON. That is to say, the railroad company building the bridge is bound to carry freight and passengers at one rate and any other company requiring the use of the bridge shall be obliged to pay a different rate.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; in this section the first provision referred to is applicable to the railroads crossing the bridge, and applies to contracts, as I understand it, between the railroad companies respectively and their freighters or passengers. The other provision refers to the agreement betwcen the railroad company owning the bridge and any other company desiring to pass over it.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Secretary of War is not bound in that case to permit the railroad company applying to cross the bridge to pay merely the rates that passengers and freight on the railroad pay.

Mr. ALLISON. He may exact from other companies a higher rate than this company is authorized to receive from the public?

Mr. McMILLAN. In determining what the company applying to use the bridge shall pay he is not restricted to the rates of freight charged for passing over the bridge or on the entire route.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to understand the principle upon which these two provisions rest. It seems where a railroad company builds a bridge across a navigable river, which we suppose to be more expensive than any ordinary portion of its railroad, this provision restricts it from charging for the use of that bridge any more than it charges for any other mile or portion of its road. Then the sixth section appears, and authorizes any other railway to pass over that bridge upon an exact equality with the railroad company that built it, and of course in doing so it must charge only the same price charged by the railroad company constructing the bridge. It seems to me these are two inconsistent provisions.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, they are not inconsistent, because one applies to the rate of freight as between a railroad company and its customers, and the other relates to an agreement between two companies desiring to use the same bridge, and the Secretary of War is not restricted, in determining what one company shall pay to another which owns the bridge, to the rate for passengers and freight.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand it is the purpose of the sixth section to allow the railroad company constructing the bridge to charge a higher price for its use than the public pay.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator, perhaps, does not put it in exactly the way that the bill does. The bill provides that in determining the amount to be paid, where one company desires to use the railroad bridge of another, the Secretary of War shall not be restricted to the ordinary rate of freight on the line of the road.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, that is the substance of what I said.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR ATCHISON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6013) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 2 miles north and 2 miles south of the city of Atchison, in the county of Atchison, in the State of Kansas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SALINE CITY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5685) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at the most accessible point in Saline City, or within 5 miles above or 5 miles below the same, in the county of Saline, in the State of Missouri.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SAINT CHARLES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5684) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at the most accessible point between the mouth of the Femme Osage Creek and a point 2 miles above the city of Saint Charles, in the county of Saint Charles, in the State of Missouri.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SAINT JOSEPH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, after section 2, to insert the following additional section:

SEC. 3. That in case said bridge be constructed as a low bridge, there shall be at least one protection-pier of masonry, crib-work or piling, extending from the upper end of a pivot-pier or one of the rest-piers of a draw-span, up stream, for a distance of not less than 500 feet from the center line of the bridge, or such other distance as may be determined by the Secretary of War, which protection-pier shall be properly arranged with ring-bolts and fender-planking so as to enable boats to tie up alongside of it and drop down through the draw-openings at such times as it may be dangerous to attempt the passage of the draw-opening under headway. That all draw or pivot spans authorized by this act shall be operated by steam or other reliable mechanical power, and shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, except when trains are passing over said span or spans; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening said draw after the passage of trains; and in case the opening of a draw be delayed by reason of the passing of a train after the signal has been given from a boat ready to pass through, the draw shall be opened for the passage of such boat before another train is allowed to pass over the bridge. That the piers of all high channel-spans and all pivot-spans shall be built parallel with the current of the river at that stage of water which is most important for navigation; and riprapping, or other protection for imperfect foundations which will materially lessen the water way, shall not be employed in the channel ways of the high spans or of the draw-openings, and piers which will produce cross-currents or bars dangerous to navigation shall not be constructed; and if, after construction, any piers or protection walls are found to produce the above-mentioned effects, the nuisance shall be abated or corrected by or at the expense of the persons owning said bridge. That in case the approaches to draw-span openings, channel-spans, or raft-passages in said bridge be found dangerous or difficult of access by any important class of river traffic, the Secretary of War shall order the construction of such sheer-booms, guide-piers, or other similar device as will obviate the difficulty, which sheer-boom, guide-pier, or other device shall be paid for by the persons owning said bridge. That the persons owning, controlling, or operating the bridge authorized by this act shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, and during heavy fogs, such lights or other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and shall, in case a high bridge be constructed, during the season of navigation, have posted in a conspicuous place on or near the bridge the clear head-room under the channel-span on that day, the figures expressing this height to be not less than 2 feet high, and to be readily visible from any point in the channel of the river for a stretch of 3,000 feet above and 1,000 feet below the bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section [5] 6, to insert:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, suit may be brought in the circuit courts of the United States of Missouri or Kansas in whose jurisdiction any portion of said bridge may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of bridges is hereby expressly reserved.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT CHAMBERLAIN.

The bill (H. R. 7651) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River near or in the vicinity of Chamberlain, in the Territory of Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAINT CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or lake) at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Stillwater, Minn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will not permit this bill to be laid aside informally that we may proceed with the execution of the order of the Senate for the passage of the bridge bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside informally in order that the bridge bills may be proceeded with.

Mr. CULLOM. I think no member of the Senate can say that I have been disposed to be factious in opposing anything that anybody desired in connection with legislation, but I must object to an interference with the right of way that the interstate-commerce bill has, in the hope that we may get it out of the way very soon. The Senator from Minnesota, I have no doubt, will be able to finish his bills to-morrow morning in the morning hour.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that there is a Senate bill on the same subject as the House bill just passed, which had better be postponed indefinitely. The title of the Senate bill will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 576) to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or lake) at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Taylor's Falls, Minn."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be made to postpone that bill indefinitely if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bills remaining on the Calendar authorizing the construction of bridges, reported by the Committee on Commerce, are all House bills. I think about an hour would be sufficient to dispose of what remain, and I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be permitted to proceed to-morrow morning after the conclusion of the morning business to the disposition of these bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent of the Senate that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, the House bridge bills favorably reported may be proceeded with.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bridge bills on the Calendar. There may be a Senate bill among them; I do not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I gave notice yesterday that this morning after the morning business was disposed of I should ask the Senate to take from the table a certain memorial, presented by the Senator from New York some days ago, with a view of submitting a few remarks and then moving its reference. I gave way to the Senator from Minnesota this morning, who has passed quite a number of bills. I must therefore ask the Senator to indulge me a short time to-morrow before he takes up his bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN]? Does the Chair understand the Senator from Oregon to object?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and such is the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I simply renew my notice or give it in connection with the application of the Senator from Minnesota.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2239) extending the time for the completion of the records of the clerk of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and the transfer of the same to the Department of State.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4629) for the relief of Levi Jones; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6429) granting a pension to Eunice E. Clark, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NEECE, Mr. PINDAR, and Mr. CONGER managers at the conference on its part.

CONSIDERATION OF CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. PIKE. I desire unanimous consent of the Senate that after the morning hour on Friday morning we proceed to the consideration of claims bills on the Calendar in their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New Hampshire as requesting that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills indicated by him within the morning hour or after 2 o'clock?

Mr. PIKE. After the business of the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent of the Senate that on Friday morning next, after the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bills indicated by him, the claims bills.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose that will confine the Senator to the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. To what class of bills does the Senator's request apply?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will please state the bills he proposes to consider at the time indicated.

Mr. PIKE. Such as have been reported by the Committee on Claims at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had directed him to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is, in section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," to strike out "and from the same original point of departure."

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMDEN. Let the clause be read as it will stand if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction.

Mr. CAMDEN. Before the vote is taken I wish to say a word. In order that my amendments may be properly understood, having offered two amendments to the fourth section of the pending bill covering pretty much the same ground, I will explain that the fourth section as it stands in the bill is made up of two provisions: First, limiting the provision to prevent charging more for a short than for a longer haul in the same direction "to the original point of departure;" and, second, the proviso giving to the commission to be appointed discretion to vary the application of the rule.

I am opposed to both these provisions, and my amendment first offered covers both. But as I am seeking results that I conceive to be beneficial, and as some Senators may be willing to vote to remove the restriction confining its operations to the same original points of departure and give the bill general application, but may not be willing to remove the discretion given to the commissioners to be appointed, I have thought it best to submit the amendments separately.

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator sits down I wish to suggest to him that I am not sure that I understand this amendment thoroughly. Last year I rather favored the general views of the proposition submitted by the Representative from Texas in the other House [Mr. REAGAN]. I do not propose to be exact as to the provisions, but this condition of things existed: Between San Francisco and Omaha a car-load of freight cost say $300, while from Omaha to Reno, several hundred miles nearer to Omaha than San Francisco is and on the same line of road, a similar car loaded with exactly the same freight, drawn by the same locomotive, would be charged $700, over double what was charged from Omaha all the way through to San Francisco. No one, as far as I am aware, feels able to justify that, and nothing permits it except the arbitrary power of the Pacific railroads. Reno being, say, 700 miles nearer San Francisco than is Omaha, do I understand the amendment to allow the railroad not to charge more from Omaha to Reno than it does from Omaha to San Francisco? Would you allow them to charge from Cheyenne to Reno, a still shorter distance, more than from Omaha to San Francisco? They have got to start from Omaha before the provision in the bill is applicable to them; and I believe the amendment is to strike out the words limiting it to the same point of departure.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment is to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure." If these words be stricken out, the result is simply to prohibit charging more in the aggregate for a short haul than a long haul going over the same line of road and in the same direction, without regard to the point of departure. That is the question now.

Mr. BECK. And this last amendment would prevent the larger charge whether the freight started from the same point or not, would it not?

Mr. HARRIS. That is just what the Senator from West Virginia and myself are striving to accomplish.

Mr. BECK. Then I know how to vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Vote to strike out those words.

Mr. BECK. I have the information, and I will so vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. CALL. This bill allows as freight compensation for transportation, if adopted, as much for a short as for a long haul. If you start from the city of Chicago the transporter may charge under this bill for one mile as much as he charges all the way to New York. It does not settle what is the proper scale of prices between transportation for a short distance and a long distance, but it simply prohibits that it shall be any greater for a shorter distance than for a longer one, but it may be as great. Manifestly that is but one step in the right direction. All contracts under the principles of law are required to be reasonable, and that reasonableness must have some standard, it must be in relation to the cost of the service and to the reasonable profit that ought to be made from it.

We have arrived at a period when it is manifest that the rates of transportation over the great highways of the country must be regulated by law; that the principle of the unlimited freedom of private contracts must be regulated, as I have said, by the principles of law. In all civilized countries a contract is that in which you give something for something else, and there must be some relation between the value of the consideration and a reasonable consideration.

It is manifest that it is utterly unreasonable that any transportation company should be allowed to charge for one mile as much as they charge for a thousand miles; and if there be any danger that that company will do that, that is the point which ought to be a feature of the legislation to which we direct ourselves; it must be a reasonable compensation to the carrier and a reasonable guard to the freight or person being transported; and this bill, I think, is but a feeble step in that direction.

I have looked at it closely, and manifestly until you can arrive at some standard by which you can affix a reasonable rate, reasonable in respect to the cost of the service, reasonable in respect to the value of the thing transported, you have attained an inadequate result, and one which will not satisfy the great present needs of the public service. There must be a fairness toward the persons engaged in transportation, the capital and labor engaged in transportation, and an equal regard for the producer, the owner, and the person transported; and it is certainly one of the great questions of the age how to arrive at that result. I think it can only be done by some fair tribunal, in which all parties shall be represented, who shall be charged with the duty by law, so far as the jurisdiction of the Federal Government extends, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, to adjust this part of transportation, not by vague rules that the common carrier may transport for a short distance at as great a price as he charges for a longer distance, but by saying that he shall charge a reasonable rate, to be fixed by some agreement between the parties properly represented and some public authority upon the theory of the value and cost of the service and the value of the thing transported.

I shall vote cheerfully for this amendment proposing to strike out the words "and from the original point of departure," because that is a move in that direction. It leaves to that extent the bill unfettered, allowing the charge to be made on a fair basis, and making operative the prohibition that the companies shall not charge more for a shorter than a longer distance to any of the intermediate places, whereas by this bill even that poor concession to the public rights is limited to the same point of departure of all freight and passengers.

Mr. CULLOM. I have hesitated to take up the time of the Senate in talking about this bill more than I did in the outset by way of explanation, and I shall not take more than a few moments' time now; but I desire that the Senate shall understand the theory of the bill.

If Senators will read the bill they will find that the first declaration, after describing the scope of it, is against extortion; the second is against discrimination between persons, and the third is against discrimination between places as well as persons. The purpose of the bill is to prevent extortion and discrimination between persons or between places; so that when the Senator from Florida says that there is nothing in this bill to prevent these outrageous discriminations that are talked about, for instance, a greater charge for a hundred miles than a thousand, the Senator is mistaken, because the whole theory of the bill is against any such thing being done by the transportation companies of the country.

I desire to say further that the committee having this subject in charge have gone just as far as language would enable them to go to prevent extortion, to prevent unjust discrimination, and to prevent undue preference, all of those things which are the crying evils of the day.

But when we come to the question of the long and short haul, the committee, in the light of the testimony taken, and in the light of the history of the nations on that particular subject, have not felt that it was safe to go further than is indicated in the provisions of the fourth section. The committee felt that it was an unsafe step to take to declare that an absolute short-haul provision should be enacted into a statute of the United States, to be in force in all cases; and therefore we did not venture further than the State of Massachusetts has gone on that subject.

In that State they have not ventured to go further than to declare in favor of the principle that transportation charges shall not be more for a lesser than for a greater distance, starting from a given place and going in the same direction and on the same line of road. That is as far as this bill goes; but when the Senator says that because it does not declare that carriers shall not charge as much for 100 miles as for 500 miles there is no remedy against discrimination he is mistaken. When he says we thereby authorize a railroad company to charge just as much or more, if it sees proper to do it, he is mistaken. We insist that under the general provision of the law a railroad company is not permitted to charge an exorbitant or extortionate price for a shorter distance as between it and the longer one.

Now, to show the drift of the testimony on that subject by the most enlightened men who have been before the committee, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the views of a few of the persons who have been before us, and whose statements illustrate the theory of the business people of the country on the question of legislation on the subject of the short and long haul. Take the commissioners of the State of Kansas, for instance. I do not know of any way that I can get the points before the Senate more distinctly than by reading from the statements of these gentlemen who have given their views before the committee. Take the commissioners of the State of Kansas. They say:

> To devise a system of maximum rates, covering every species of interstate traffic, on the basis of rates for long hauls from the extreme West to the East, would paralyze every railroad engaged in the business. On the other hand, to equalize the rates as between long and short hauls, i. e., to introduce a proportionate equality in the rates between local and continental interstate traffic would, if railroad property is to be preserved and its efficiency maintained, advance the rates on great distances to such an extent as to put an embargo upon the movement of the cereal crops of the extreme West or the trans-Mississippi region, a result which would be little less disastrous to the East than to the West.
> It has been rendered possible for the great West to reach a rapid and prosperous development by a system of low rates upon the movement of the leading productions of that region to tide water. The attractions of the West, enhanced and made available by the unparalleled creation of railroad facilities, have induced a movement of population from the East to the West, thus relieving an overburdened labor market, and reducing those causes of discontent and restlessness among the employed laborers of the country that eventuate in serious disturbances to her established industries and frequently threaten the public peace.
> On the other hand, the abundant production of food, by the utilization of the Western lands, and its cheap distribution by railway lines to remote distances, lighten the burdens of the laborer and increase the ability of the country to carry on its industrial development.

Mr. INGALLS. From what is the Senator reading now?

Mr. CULLOM. I am reading from a communication of the commissioners of the State of Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. Does it appear in the report?

Mr. CULLOM. It appears in the testimony in the shape of a prepared paper in response to a request by the committee.

> It will be seen that the benefits derived from the low system of rates prevailing on the great movements of food products, as compared with rates upon movements more local in character, are shared by each section of the country.

I desire to call the attention of Senators to that declaration. The impression seems to be that if there is a little discrimination in local rates the people of the locality get no benefit, from the fact that the through freights are hauled at a cheaper rate, but the opposite is the fact. Every portion of this country—the farmer upon the fields of the West, as well as the mechanic in the shops of the East—is alike interested in having the products of different sections of the country moved long distances at cheap rates, which benefit the people who require these products as well as the people who raise them. The commissioners also say:

> It may be further remarked that this differentiation in rates is a result that has been brought about by no conventional or voluntary arrangement between companies operating interstate lines of railway. But it has been forced by the natural laws of commerce operating upon geographical lines, and which can not be changed without changing the distribution of land and water on the continent, or by annihilating distance without the aid of steam; and any attempt by the law-making power to contravene these natural laws, thus necessitated by our geographical situation, would end in disastrous derangement of our commercial system.

These are the views of the commission in Kansas, and I doubt not the views that are entertained by the people of that country who are raising the corn, and the cattle, and the products of that section and shipping them to the Eastern market.

Mr. CAMDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Why do the people of the extreme Western States ask to get their products to market cheaper than the people residing in the Middle States, cultivating land costing twice as much as the lands in the West; and why will the people in the East be benefited by having the States occupying an intermediate position charged twice as much for getting to market as for getting the products of the West to market? The Middle States produce more surplus of cattle, grain, wheat, and corn than the Western States. They are charged a higher rate for transporting their products than those farther west.

Mr. CULLOM. In the first place, the people of the extreme West are not asking that their transportation shall cost less to the seaboard than the transportation of the products of the people of the Middle States; but the interests of the whole country, as well of the State of Kansas, the State of Iowa, the State of Nebraska, the State of Illinois, and the State of West Virginia are all concerned, that whatever produce is raised in this country shall find a market somewhere.

That is the proposition; and if the transportation companies are not able to haul the corn of Kansas or the cattle of Kansas at as cheap a rate per mile as is charged in other States, if that product can not be gotten to the market at one rate, it is the interest of the whole country that that product shall get to the market somehow or other, not in the interest simply of the neighborhood in which the Senator from West Virginia lives, but in the interest of the whole people. It may perhaps be true that some of my own people in the State of Illinois may think that a short haul is in their interest, and so it may be in a few neighborhoods; but when you take the whole people of the State of Illinois and associate them with all the rest of this country, I assert that it is their interest that the products of Illinois as well as of the other States of the Union shall find a market, and we not only have to depend upon the market in Chicago, but the market in New York and the market in Baltimore and Boston, and we also look beyond that to the markets on the other side of the water; and any system that this Congress or any other shall inaugurate which will result in preventing the very cheapest transportation to the seaboard of products which go to the people on the other side of the water if they need them, is a short-sighted system that we ought not to advocate here.

I appeal to Senators to look to the main proposition, that it is not simply a question of whether Tom Jones can get his corn to market in Springfield or any other town in Illinois, and thence to Chicago, as cheaply per mile as the corn of Chicago can go to Boston, but it is a question of what the general policy shall be in order to encourage commerce all over this land.

Now, let us go a little further. Take Mr. Russell, of Boston, for instance. Let us see how this long and short haul principle will operate in Massachusetts in his judgment. The Senator from New York, in behalf of the committee, asked him this question:

Senator MILLER. How would a Federal law prohibiting the charging as much for a short haul as for a long haul affect Boston? In other words, a law stating that a railroad should not charge as much for 900 miles as for 100?

Mr. Russell is the chairman of the railroad commission of the State of Massachussetts, a gentleman who is perhaps as well informed upon these questions and who has given as much thought and attention to them as almost any other man that I have met in this country. Mr. Russell said:

Mr. RUSSELL. It would injure Boston very seriously. I suppose we would try to live. We still have one advantage. We are twenty-four hours nearer England. That gives an advantage, especially in the export of live animals.

Senator MILLER. Why should not the ports along the seaboard which are nearer the great fields of the West, like New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Newport News, have the advantage which comes from that fact?

Mr. RUSSELL. The only reason that occurs to me is the advantage of keeping open a number of competing ports and of competing lines.

Suppose we adopt a short-haul system, by which New York, for instance, would get an advantage of Boston or of Philadelphia, and would become the great seaport town. The result would be that the trains from the West would go to that port, the mercantile goods from the Old Country would come to New York, and the great cities that are a few miles farther away from the West and from New York would be dried up and would not be able to live and compete at all. Do the people of this country want that? We have to take a broader view of this question than simply to consider whether 10 bushels of corn in my crib are going to cost me 5 cents more for transportation to market than the corn in somebody's else crib somewhere else. I say the people of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and New Orleans should all have an almost equal opportunity of getting the great productions of this country into their markets, so as to enable them all to share in distributing them to the people who want them in the different sections of the country.

Now let us see what Mr. Kernan, chairman of the New York railroad commission, said on the short-haul question. They have no law there governing the short-haul subject, but the commission have adopted a rule themselves, and I will read it:

Railroads should not, as a general rule, charge more between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal and a more distant point, even though at such more distant point there be railroad or water competition, unless railroads can affirmatively establish such circumstances governing such competition as justify the higher charge for the shorter distance.

That is the general rule by which they are governed. Mr. Kernan said:

That we agree upon as a rule. The question I was discussing was whether a specific statute making that the law would be proper, whether such a provision would be proper in the statute which you contemplate passing to regulate interstate commerce. I believe that in such a statute there should be this provision, with the power in somebody to modify or permit exceptions to it.

There is the view of the railroad commissioners of New York, one of them, Mr. Kernan, an able lawyer. They have given attention and study to the subject, and they say they are in favor of a short-haul provision, but they must have the means of making exceptions to the law. That is what the committee have recommended to the Senate, and I assert that if we go beyond that we shall take a very dangerous step.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the permission of my friend from Illinois, on this precise point I should be glad to ask him whether the committee mean in section 4, of which he is now speaking (as I assume they do not), to provide that these exceptions which the commission may make, being made, shall have the force of law and that they shall not have the power to change them?

Mr. CULLOM. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The language would seem to imply that having once made a rule that covered these exceptions it should have the force of law as if put in this statute, and then the question would be raised by the railroad lawyers whether the commission had any right to change it.

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad the Senator asked the question. If the language of the section referred to by the Senator can be construed into any such meaning, I should certainly be in favor of its amendment. The purpose of the committee simply was to give the commission power for the time being to make exceptions, with power to change the rule or make the exceptions as they saw proper.

Mr. HARRIS. I could not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont and would have been very glad to have heard it.

Mr. CULLOM. I will state what the Senator said if it is desired. The Senator from Vermont makes the inquiry whether in section 4 it was the purpose of the committee to make the rules specifying exceptions to the short-haul provision permanent, whether it was the purpose of the committee to make that rule the law until repealed by Congress, or whether it should simply be the rule until the commission changed it from time to time when it saw proper. I say the committee had no purpose whatever of incorporating any provision in that section or anywhere else which would authorize the commission to make laws, but simply to make a rule governing the subject, liable to change by the commission whenever in its judgment it saw proper to make a change. Am I not right in that?

Mr. HARRIS. Clearly so, as I think.

Mr. CULLOM. If the section is at all doubtful, I shall be glad to have the Senator from Vermont or any one else suggest a proper amendment.

Now let us look a little further, Mr. President. Take the testimony of Mr. Randolph, of Chicago, who for very many years was the secretary of the board of trade of that city and a gentleman of very high intelligence and study on this subject. I shall read but briefly from any of these gentlemen. Mr. Randolph said:

In the above view of the case, and for other reasons bearing in the same direction, I feel confident that it would be a public calamity to prohibit any railway line, whether engaged in interstate or only in State transportation, from charging a greater rate per mile or even a greater rate irrespective of mileage for a short than for a long haul; but in no case should a rate for a short distance or any rate whatever be permitted which is based on an attempt to recover losses made by some other and lower relative rate.

That, we think, we have guarded against in the bill. The theory of transportation, the theory of the bill is that we must recognize the right in the interest of commerce generally to charge less per mile, if you please, for the long than for the short haul; but we did not seek to allow and we attempted to prevent any recoupment upon the short-haul shippers for losses that might be sustained on account of the long haul; and therefore I say that the provisions of the bill would require that the commission should follow and prosecute any attempt on the part of a railroad company to extort from the short-haul shippers in the interest of the long-haul shippers.

Next, Mr. President, take Mr. Parker, whose statement appears on page 196 of the report. I desire to refer to these things, so that the views of some of the most intelligent and competent business men shall be published before the Senate so that they may understand that there is more in this question of charging more for a short haul than a longer distance than upon the face of the thing there might seem to appear, and there are illustrations where it would be absolutely necessary in my judgment that the commission, if one were to be created and a short-haul provision were to be adopted at all, should have power to make exceptions.

Mr. Parker represents the railroad beginning in Saint Louis, running across the river into Illinois, and leaving the line of the river 25 or 30 miles and coming to the river again at Cairo.

Both ends of the road are in the water, you may say, and it would be impossible, as Mr. Parker asserts and as I believe, for him to run that road successfully if he could not charge more for transportation to some of these places away from the river than he charges at Saint Louis, for instance, going to Cairo. I desire to read some of Mr. Parker's testimony, because I think he is a very intelligent man and puts it in very good shape.

He says:

One is a home question. It is a matter between the railroad and its patrons living upon its line, the men upon whom it depends for its regular traffic and regular income—its bread and butter, so to speak. The other—

Referring to the through traffic—

The other is largely a territorial question, and is a strife not so much between railroads as between trade centers—common points. The railroads are used not so much to make profit for themselves in that case as they are used as sinews of war by the trade centers upon which they depend for business, and where they terminate. So that any comparison between through and local rates can not be intelligently made, unless you bear in mind this distinction and these different incentives and necessities that create the one and the other. One is based on cost of service; the other on the necessity of the case, regardless of expense.

* * * * * * *

About 33⅓ per cent. of the operating expenses of this road is continuous, regardless of whether the road is earning much or little, and it therefore requires a certain volume of business to meet these fixed expenses. In most cases, and especially in some seasons of the year, the local business of the road of itself is not of sufficient volume to make up paying trains, nor is it sufficient to make the earnings over and above current expenses sufficient to meet the fixed charges against the road. So that in order to run paying trains we generally, after we have built the road to accommodate the local territory, endeavor to get a connection for through business to be superadded to the local business. Then when we make up a train of ten or fifteen cars of local freight to go over our line from Saint Louis, we can attach fifteen or twenty cars more of strictly through business. We can take the latter at a very low rate rather than go without it. We are justified in doing so, as one does no prejudice to the other.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator inform me whether the statement being read now by him refers to the Saint Louis and Cairo road, and whether it would be affected by the amendment now pending?

Mr. CULLOM. I think that road would be. I was reading a portion of Mr. Parker's testimony.

We would thereby have a good paying train. Yet half of it would be made up of very low-grade freight, taken at a low rate. The road would be justified in taking it, for the reason that it would cost very little more to perform the service, and it would operate no injustice to the local patrons of the road who were paying a higher rate on the local freight. This would only apply to competitive freight.

Being asked what would be the effect upon the local charges of his road if it were prohibited from taking such through freight at lower rates, Mr. Parker replied:

It would result in our having to increase our local rates. It is a question of aggregate earnings, and if we do not earn enough to float the company from one source we must from another.

And so on. I shall not take up the time in reading from Mr. Parker any further. Now let me read from a gentleman in the Southern portion of the country, a Mr. Haines, representing two or three roads in Georgia. He illustrates the question of the long and short haul very thoroughly by one single illustration. He says:

Railroads are built to accommodate communities dependent for transportation upon water courses, turnpikes, or public roads. They furnish cheaper and more convenient facilities than such communities before possessed, but still it costs something to maintain and operate them. If no charge was made for using them, this cost would have to be met by taxation. But whether met by taxation or by charging freight and passenger rates, it is a tax at least upon the communities which have no other road to market. If it costs $600,000 per annum to keep up a road—then the money must come out of the freight and passengers that are obliged to pass over it. Whether the amount of business be small or large, the money to keep up the road must be forthcoming, or it will go to decay. If 100,000 bales of cotton were the only freight that passed over a road which carried no passengers, that cotton would have to pay a freight of $6 per bale if it cost $600,000 per annum to maintain the road, and no legislation could make it otherwise. But if the quantity of cotton to be transported could be increased to 200,000 bales, then the cost of transportation could be fixed at $3 per bale, to the great joy and relief of the shippers of the first 100,000 bales; and yet the $600,000 required to operate the road would be forthcoming.

Now, suppose that the community which raised this second 100,000 bales had a water route to market and said to the railroad company, "It only costs a dollar per bale to ship our cotton by water, but we prefer to ship it by rail at the same price," who would be benefited if the company took the cotton at a dollar per bale? Who but the local shippers themselves, for without this addition to the business of the road they would have to pay $600,000 per year, or $6 per bale, to keep up the road, while with the $100,000 obtained from the other 100,000 bales of competitive or through cotton they would have to pay but $500,000, or $5 per bale on their own cotton. Should they turn around upon the managers of the railroad and say that it was unjust to the local shippers to charge only a dollar per bale on the through cotton? No, it is not only just but to the benefit of the local shippers that the railroad which they are obliged to use should get all the business it can from those who are not obliged to use it, and at any rate the latter choose to pay, provided, and it is a very important provision, that such competitive business adds something to the net revenue of the road: or, in other words, if it be carried at anything above the actual cost of transportation.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that the testimony of such men as I have read from before the Senate to-day is sufficient to satisfy every intelligent man that we are treading upon exceedingly delicate and doubtful ground when we legislate upon the question of the long and short haul. I am free to confess that I have never fully satisfied myself that it was a safe thing to do at all. I have hesitated about it, as the Senate itself knows. During the discussion of the bill pending before the Senate during the last Congress, which I had the honor to report to the Senate, I left out of the bill altogether anything touching upon a short-haul law, but upon the investigation that the committee has been enabled to make this year I found, and I frankly state it, that there is a public sentiment and a public belief throughout the country in the minds of the people that by means of the difference between the long and the short haul in this country the short-haul people are terribly swindled, and that this is worse than the advantages from the cheap long hauls.

I have felt that there was something in that, but I have not felt that it was safe for this Congress or any Congress to go further as a beginning than to say that transporters shall not charge more for the transportation of property or persons on a given road for the shorter than the longer distance going in the same direction and from the same original starting-point. I do not believe that it is safe for us to go beyond that. I wish I knew that we could safely legislate in every particular so that we could stop every species of unjust discrimination or extortion that has been going on in the operation of the railroads of this country. There is no man in the Senate who has a greater desire to protect the people of the country against extortion and against unjust discrimination or any wrong on the part of the railroads of the country than myself, I believe. I realize that there have been great wrongs, and I will enumerate some of the complaints which the people make against the railroad companies of the country as they have been summed up by the committee in its report:

The complaints against the railroad system of the United States expressed to the committee are based upon the following charges:

1. That local rates are unreasonably high compared with through rates.

That is just what I have been talking about.

2. That both local and through rates are unreasonably high at non-competing points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operation.

3. That rates are established without apparent regard to the actual cost of the service performed, and are based largely on "what the traffic will bear."

4. That unjustifiable discriminations are constantly made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances.

5. That improper discriminations are made between articles of freight and branches of business of a like character and between different quantities of the same class of freight.

6. That unreasonable discriminations are made between localities similarly situated.

7. That the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management is, by an elaborate system of secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, to foster monopoly, to enrich favored shippers, and to prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.

8. That such favoritism and secrecy introduce an element of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retards the development of our industries and commerce.

9. That the secret cutting of rates and the sudden fluctuations that constantly take place are demoralizing to all business except that of a purely speculative character, and frequently occasion great injustice and heavy losses.

10. That, in the absence of national and uniform legislation, the railroads are able by various devices to avoid their responsibility as carriers, especially on shipments over more than one road or from one State to another, and that shippers find great difficulty in recovering damages for the loss of property or for injury thereto.

11. That railroads refuse to be bound by their own contracts, and arbitrarily collect large sums in the shape of overcharges in addition to the rates agreed upon at the time of shipment.

12. That railroads often refuse to recognize or be responsible for the acts of dishonest agents acting under their authority.

13. That the common law fails to afford a remedy for such grievances, and that in cases of dispute the shipper is compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad manager or pool commissioner, or run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discriminations.

14. That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.

15. That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.

16. That the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.

17. That railroad corporations have improperly engaged in lines of business entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantages have been afforded to business enterprises in which railroad officials were interested.

18. That the management of the railroad business is extravagant and wasteful, and that a needless tax is imposed upon the shipping and traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business.

These are in brief the complaints which have been made to the committee by the people as we passed over the country undertaking to find out what were their complaints, if they had any, and at the same time their views with reference to this subject in the way of legislation. The committee have sought to prepare a bill which would cure these evils as far as possible, but all the time having in view as well the danger that we might make an error by adopting some course which would not only cripple the railroads but would injure the business of the country as well.

I desire to refer for a moment to the long and short haul question again. I read from the Popular Science Monthly an extract from an article written by a gentleman who has given this subject very much study, both from the point of view of the practical operation of the roads in this country and historically with reference to the action of other nations upon the subject. He says:

The short-haul principle provides that a railroad shall not charge a larger gross sum for a part of any route than it does for the whole; not more, for instance, from Chicago to Springfield, Mass., than from Chicago to Boston. It is thus intended to prevent the more outrageous forms of local discrimination. There can be no doubt that as a general principle it is correct.

That is the general principle, and it is correct, and the committee have put it in the bill; but at the same time from our investigation of the facts we became satisfied that we could not recommend consistently with our judgment a provision absolutely preventing the charging of more in every instance for a short than for a long haul.

"There can be no doubt that as a general principle it is correct." But it is not one which it is always possible to enforce by law. If the law can reach all the rival routes, and can be enforced against all of them, it does much good and little or no harm. But if it reaches one route and not another, it simply makes the other route a present of the through traffic. What, for instance, would be the effect of a national short-haul law on the movement of wheat from Chicago to the seaboard? At present it is a traffic which the railroads can afford to make special efforts to secure, and they bring the rates down nearly to the level of operating expenses. If they reduced local rates to this basis, they would have nothing left to pay fixed charges. The only way by which they could comply with the law would be by raising through rates. This would simply have the effect of sending the wheat to Europe via Montreal instead of via American ports. The Grand Trunk Railroad, which would be outside of our control, would have the chance to make low through rates and get the heavy through traffic. The English stockholders of the Grand Trunk would be the persons most benefited by such a law.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this language:

It is only a few years since the Prussian Government got into trouble in exactly this way. It was thought by the authorities that the low through rates favored the foreigners at the expense of the Germans; and an attempt was made to carry out the short-haul principle rigidly. The result simply was that the foreigners sent their goods by other routes, which Bismarck was unable to control, and that the Prussian railroads lost a part of their traffic, which, low as were the rates charged upon it, was yet a matter of importance to their business prosperity.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate longer in discussing this question, and I beg pardon for taking as much time as I have done. But it seemed to me that the Senate was liable to do an injustice. I do not mean to the railroads, but to the business of the country; and I appeal to Senators to stop before they rush into specific legislation here which they would be called upon to repeal, I fear, by the time another Congress meets.

I wish I was certain that we could pass an absolute short-haul law, and that it would not affect the business of the country unfavorably, and that it would operate fairly upon all the people of all the States in all portions of the country; but I dare not venture, so far as I am concerned, to go further in that direction than has been recommended and adopted in the State of Massachusetts, nor further than the history of legislation in other nations will justify us in going. So I trust that the Senate will stand by the bill and adopt the fourth section as it stands with such amendments as the Senator from Vermont suggests if they are necessary, so that the rule may not be regarded as an absolute law and unchangeable.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator has just been discussing the question of the long and short haul. I wish to have the construction of the committee on the meaning of the proviso to the fourth section, which is in these words:

Provided, however, That, upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time make general rules covering exceptions to any such common carrier in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, exempting such designated common carrier in such special cases from the operation of this section of this act.

Does the committee construe that to mean that railroad corporations when competing with each other can be relieved in special cases by the commission, or that there can only be relief granted where a railroad or railroads come in competition with water transportation?

Mr. CULLOM. My own view is that the commission will have power, wherever upon investigation it finds that it is necessary in the interest of transportation and fairness to the public to make exceptions, wherever it may be, whether on the border of the lakes or rivers or canals or what not.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate further.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, as I am a member of the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, it is perhaps proper for me to state why I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to the fourth section of the bill. The committee which have reported this bill have given the subject very careful examination and consideration. And although the bill reported is not pretended to be a panacea for all the evils growing out of the management of the transportation system, it will, I believe (should it become a law), go very far toward the correction of some of the admitted abuses, and will enable us to discover, through the report of the commision, what further legislation may be necessary.

The provisions of the present bill are based upon the theory that the paramount evil charged against the operation of the railroad transportation system is the unjust discrimination between persons, places, and commodities of particular description. It is the unanimous judgment of your committee that the bill in its general scope will correct many of the abuses complained of without in any way impairing the efficiency of the transportation interests or jeopardizing the capital invested in railroads. The principal difference of opinion has arisen upon the proposition now pending with regard to the "long and short haul." The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and myself, the minority of the committee, had intended to introduce the identical amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] to strike out the words in the fifth line of the fourth section, "in the same direction and from the same original point of departure."

This is a question which has been discussed by all the eminent railroad men in this country. More than twenty State Legislatures have had this identical question before them. It ought to be well considered here before final action is taken. I think I am entirely safe in saying that all the legislation which has been attempted in Englaud or in any State of this Union which has sought to fix arbitrary rates of freight per ton per mile or to regulate the mode of transportation by an inflexible law has been a failure.

The only success that we have had in this country in controlling the railroads, in forcing them to give to the public the rights which the public believe they are entitled to, has been under the various acts of State Legislatures which gave the commission no power except the power to supervise and report any and all acts of discrimination as to individuals or localities.

The common-law right of the citizen to be protected against extortion and unjust discrimination exists, but the remedy for the violation has been found to be wholly inadequate unless the State intervenes through a commission, as in the case of Massachusetts. Mr. Charles Francis Adams, formerly a member of that commission, in his statement, which will be found on page 1202 of the testimony, says that "sixteen years ago the State of Massachusetts, by what at that time was nothing but a happy guess, hit on the true theory of legislative dealing with this question," that the Legislature carefully refused to give the commission any power, and all the commission could do was to examine, report, and recommend—then having recourse to public opinion. I think it is conceded that the great success of that commission and the wonderful success of the New York commission will induce the Legislatures of the various States of the Union that act upon this subject to adopt practically their rule, relying upon public sentiment to correct the acts complained of.

But in this matter of the long and short haul every railroad expert, I think, who appeared before the committee, every writer upon the subject, both in this country and in England, admit that a rule which prohibits a railroad company from charging more for hauling a car-load 300 miles than is charged for hauling a car-load 1,000 miles over the same road and in the same direction is just and proper; but they all contend that there are innumerable instances constantly occurring where exceptions must be made, or great injustice would result. Therefore the rule should not be a rigid one, but that the commission authorized by the bill should have power, without waiting for legislation, to permit exceptions in cases where it is absolutely necessary for the public welfare or the protection of the transportation company.

The committee were so impressed with that view that in framing this bill we have inserted a provision that in each and every case where the railroad company can show that either from water competition, from competition among themselves, or any other extraordinary circumstance, such as occasionally occur in the export trade—upon showing the fact that it would destroy them, would impair their property, would prevent them from making a just return to their stockholders, upon that showing an exception may be made in each and every case so presented. Therefore, if you have a fair commission, if you have experts, men of character who desire to do justice, as they unquestionably have in the States of Massachusetts and New York, you will have no hardship upon the railroads, and yet you will have individual rights respected and non-competing points protected.

Mr. President, this is not a new question. The State of Ohio, which you represent in part on this floor, has considered and acted upon the question. Your legislation was more conservative than it was in many of the Western States, where it has proved an entire and total failure, as it has everywhere where penal and specific statutes have been passed to fix rates per ton per mile and impose penalties for violations. But you in Ohio inserted a provision in your law identical with that which is advocated by my friend from West Virginia, or, as the provision of the bill will stand if his amendment is adopted, it would be as follows:

That no company or person owning, controlling, or operating a railroad in whole or in part in this State shall charge or receive for the transportation of freight for any distance within the State a larger sum than is charged by the same company or person for the transportation in the same direction of freight of the same class or kind for an equal or greater distance over the same road and connecting lines of railroad.

That is substantially the law in operation in Ohio. The railroads there are prosperous. There never has been any proper complaint made by the managers of those roads. Many of them are owned and controlled by corporations within my State, and they have never complained of the exactions of that law because they knew that it is just and fair, and when properly enforced they had no right to complain. They know also that for twenty-five years the greatest railroad corporation in this country, with over 3,000 miles of railroad, one of the most prosperous to-day upon this continent, the great Pennsylvania Railroad, when it received from the State of Pennsylvania the artificial water ways, the canals that were constructed at an immense cost by the State, the condition was made that they should charge no higher rate for the short haul than for the long haul to the people of Pennsylvania—not that they should not charge any greater rate for the short haul within the State, but that no greater charge should be made by that road from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than they made from Chicago to Philadelphia; thus giving to that State and to her citizens the advantage of the lowest possible rate that that railroad would charge to the citizens of the West.

Now, Mr. President, what has been the result of it? They have successfully competed with all the other trunk lines that run from Chicago to the seaboard, and with the great trunk line of Canada constructed at a less cost per mile than any road in the United States, because they secured the money at about 3 per cent. Cheaply constructed as that road was, they, the Pennsylvania company, have been enabled to maintain themselves, they have built up from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia manufacturing establishments such as are on no other line of railroad in this country except the New York Central. For twenty-five years that road has been subject to the rule which we are seeking to apply to all the other railroads in the country; they have built up so great a local business that 90 per cent. of their income comes from local freight on the line of their road. There is not an officer of that company who will not admit the rule which this amendment would establish is just; that, with or without law, in the interest of the road they would adopt it.

Mr. Albert Fink, who is considered by all the railroad officials in this country as the brightest mind connected with transportation, a man who has argued their case before Congress for years, who has appeared before the committees of many of the State Legislatures to prevent hostile legislation, was before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and was questioned by my friend, the chairman, and other members of that committee. He does not hesitate to say that the rule we are seeking to adopt, making it uniform, applying it to all the roads in the country with the exception I have named, that the commission in special cases should have the right to change that rule, is right. On page 91 of testimony Mr. Fink uses the following language:

It is a rule generally adopted by all railroads to properly adjust local tariffs to the through tariffs, when the latter are reasonable and fairly remunerating. For example, the tariffs of the Pennsylvania Railroad are so arranged that no higher charge is made from any station east of Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, or from any station this side of Chicago than from Chicago. That is a rule generally adopted by all roads.

Senator HARRIS. Never to charge more for a short than for a long distance?

Mr. FINK. I do not say "never," because there are conditions under which this may be done without injustice, but it is the general rule in making tariffs.

Mr. Blanchard, who has been connected with the Baltimore and Ohio road and the Erie road, and who is a recognized authority upon these subjects, has modified his views, and he does not hesitate to say that it is a proper rule and ought to be enforced. Mr. Sterne, the great railroad lawyer, employed by commercial bodies to secure legislation to prevent extortion and discrimination, whom we had before us, says what?

That in England and before every State Legislature and before Congress up to within the last two or three years every railroad official has said that it would be destruction to the railroads to apply this rule to them, and would taunt the man who suggested it as one who did not understand the subject; and yet to-dry there is not a railroad official in this country, in the light of what has occurred on the Pennsylvania and other roads, who will not admit freely that the rule is a wise one; but he simply advises you that you can not enforce it properly.

Mr. Kernan, president of the railroad commission in New York, was mentioned by my friend the chairman, who referred to his statements and quoted in part what he said. I think the Senator, without intending to do so, may have created the impression that Mr. Kernan is of the opinion that if we attempted to enforce this short-haul rule it would be disastrous to the railroads. I do not so understand Mr. Kernan. On the contrary, when Mr. Kernan presented to the committee the rule which the New York commission had adopted—not the law, but the rule of the commission—that rule provided that—

Railroads should not, as a general rule, charge more between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal and a more distant point, even though at such more distant point there be railroad or water competition, unless railroads can affirmatively establish such circumstances governing such competition as justify the higher charge for the shorter distance.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. GORMAN. With very great pleasure.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to read from a paragraph on page 18 of the testimony, where he says:

I believe that in such a statute there should be this provision—

That is, a short-haul provision—with the power in somebody to modify or permit exceptions to it.

Mr. GORMAN. That is precisely what Mr. Kernan suggests, and that is precisely what the section will say if the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia is adopted. To put that beyond controversy, permit me to read the section as it will be if the amendment is adopted:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time make general rules covering exceptions to any such common carrier, in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, exempting such designated common carrier in such special cases from the operation of this section of this act; and when such exceptions shall have been made and published they shall have like force and effect as though the same had been specified in this section.

I submit that the section as I have read it, provided the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is adopted, comes precisely within the rule laid down by the commission of New York. It comes within the rule that is in operation upon the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is the rule which would do exact justice to every section of this country.

To illustrate what has been done and what is being done by these great trunk railroads running east and west to the detriment of communities, to the destruction of individuals and their property, it has been stated by Mr. BLANCHARD, that on a railroad that is owned in the State which I in part represent, the terminus is in Baltimore, the time has been that they have charged more for a car-load from Frederick to the city of Baltimore, 60 miles, than they now charge for the 700 miles from Chicago to Baltimore.

Mr. BLANCHARD gives another instance. He states, for example, "When I came to the Erie road in 1873 the charge on dry goods from New York to Chicago, 965 miles, was 75 cents per hundred pounds. At the same time the rate from New York city to Hornellsville on the Erie Railway, 340 miles, about 80 cents on the hundred pounds. There are innumerable instances. To-day the rule is that you can have a car transported from the city of Chicago to Baltimore or New York city for one-half the charge you can move that car from any non-competing point in the valley of the Ohio River to the city of Baltimore or New York, and this on all traffic, grain, oil, beef, lumber. Lumber can be brought from the forests of Michigan cheaper than you can move it from Wheeling to the city of Baltimore over the same road in the same direction and with no greater possible cost for moving 1 ton per mile than the other.

Now, sir, the Baltimore and Ohio and the Erie are not alone in this discrimination. There is scarcely a railroad in the country that does not practice this extortion as a rule except the Pennsylvania Railroad, and in the case of that road gentlemen appeared before the committee, who stated upon their honor that the same extortion had been made upon them; that by the Pennsylvania Company law is not in all cases observed; that there was favoritism; and I have no question myself, from the examination of the subject, that these great fortunes, growing up from tens to hundreds of millions, of gentlemen connected with the transportation interests have been in a great measure owing to favoritism by almost all the railroads of the country. I believe to-day that the great trouble with the laboring people in this country comes from this discrimination, from this favoritism, from this undue and unhealthy accumulation of wealth by a comparatively few men by means of this extortion and unjust discrimination.

There can be no question that the charging more for the intermediate distance than you do for the whole distance on any road tends to throw trade out of its natural channel, builds up turmoils at the expense of all the intermediate points. There is an unnatural increase of wealth and population, and whenever depression comes, as it does periodically, you witness the scenes you are passing through. If the short-haul rule will become a law I have no question that trade and manufactures will seek the natural channel and we shall be less liable to the disturbances which are unavoidable under the present system.

I would not advocate a proposition that would jeopardize this vast investment in railroads. There are even billions of money invested in the railroads of this country. The cost of the railroads is $60,000 a mile. I do not believe they could be duplicated to-day, if they were all to be constructed now, for the same amount of money. There are too many interests involved to treat it lightly.

I would not favor any portion of this bill if I supposed it meant an attack upon the rights of the people whose money is invested in these great enterprises. I recognize fully the competition that our roads have with the lakes and with the Canada railroads. It is a very serious question for us. I know that we have all that we can do to maintain our trade and prevent it from passing through Canada. I believe that can only be done by the most liberal action of this Government and of the people of the States.

The rates of transportation by railroad from all points in the West to the East on through freight is governed by the rate from Chicago to tide water, and that rate by rail is in fact fixed by the water rate from Chicago by the lakes and the Erie Canal. If we are to maintain the supremacy of the American lines, I have no question that the Erie Canal must be enlarged by the State of New York or by the aid of the General Government. It is only by the improvement of that great highway and the improvement of the Missouri River that you can hope to have the products of the great West transported to tide water at the minimum cost. The through rates by rail are as low as the water rates.

Whether the railroads have reached the minimum in actual cost of transportation is a question yet unsettled. They are entitled to fair compensation for the through and local freight, but there is no reason why ten million of people who reside within a radius of 200 miles of where we stand shall be made to pay four times as much for moving a ton of freight 200 miles as the people west of the Mississippi Valley pay for moving it 1,000 miles.

Mr. President, this proposition is not a new one to the railroads themselves. The great railroad war of 1877 arose upon this question of the long and short haul. It came about through the action of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad with its then president, the late Mr. John W. Garrett, who had not his superior in this country in railroad management. His success was phenomenal. He took charge of the road thirty years ago, and he kept his road upon a proper basis. It was built not by watering the stock and the bonds, but the actual construction stock payments were called in first in cash and the bonds were sold for par. It was an expensive road to construct, with a higher grade than any road crossing the Alleghany Mountains.

But the distance from tide water at Baltimore to Cincinnati and Saint Louis and Chicago is shorter than by any other line. The New York Central, with its low grades and magnificent equipment, and the Pennsylvania road, with its grand equipment, and the Erie, all more favorable in grade, but longer lines, united to compel the Baltimore and Ohio to make the same gross charge per 100 pounds, or per ton, or per car from Chicago to Baltimore as they made from Chicago to New York, the average distance being 200 miles greater to New York than Baltimore. The Baltimore and Ohio road refused to enter the combination. Mr. Garrett held that Baltimore was entitled to the rate of 3 cents per 100 pounds less than New York and Philadelphia.

In other words, he maintained and finally succeeded in enforcing the rule of the short haul, a more radical rule than that which we contend for to-day. That contest brought on a railroad war which came nearly bankrupting all the trunk-line roads. But the Baltimore and Ohio was fully sustained by public sentiment, and the State of Maryland, which owns a large interest in the road, and the city of Baltimore, and the people, without an exception, were content to jeopardize their investment in the road rather than the principle should be abandoned. Right succeeded, and what was the result? A division of the trade between the great seaboard cities.

Elevators for the accommodation of the grain trade sprung up in the harbor of Baltimore, lines of steamers were established from that port to England and France, and the cost of grain and other products by ocean carriage was largely reduced. This, it will be remembered, was a contest between the railroads for their own interests. Now we propose to enforce it in the interest of the people. It does not lie in the mouth of the railroad official to object to it. It will do no injustice to that great interest, but it will put in practical operation what was intended to be secured when the railroads were chartered—exact justice to all shippers and all localities through which the railroad passes.

Mr. SHERMAN (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Mr. President, this feature of the bill is in my judgment the only one that it is important to discuss in connection with it. The debate two years ago exhausted nearly all that could be said on either side of the other questions embraced in the bill. An amendment was proposed two years ago to introduce a provision about the long haul and the short haul, and that was debated at considerable length, and the Senate, I think by a very decided vote, declared itself against any attempt to legislate upon the subject. That was one of the marked differences between the House bill at that time and the Senate bill. However, this provision is now inserted in the Senate bill, and it seems to be founded upon a reasonable rule of equity, that no greater sum should be charged for a shorter distance than for a longer distance. It was so equitable a rule that it was difficult for me to defend the course I took in reference to the matter in discussing it with my constituents, and it was always difficult for me even to answer it to myself; but I did answer to them and to myself on this ground, that there were certain places so important in the geography of our country, certain points where the shipments were so great, where the competition was so close, the rivalry existing not only between several lines of railroad but also between the railroads and ships and water communication and between Chicago and New York, that to attempt to make a rule that would govern the commerce between Chicago and New York and apply that rule to the interior commerce on the shorter lines or at the intermediate points would seem to be difficult, if not impossible, and therefore I became satisfied that a provision like this was not a wise one.

However, the committee on this subject having considered it and having adopted this provision, I can not see why they should resist the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. If the rule is to be observed at all, it ought to be observed especially in favor of the interior points and the great intermediate points on the long railroad lines. But under the bill as it now stands if grain starting from Chicago at the rate of one-half cent a ton per mile, or say $10 a ton for the distance between New York and Chicago, is charged that rate on the through route, double that rate might be charged between any intermediate point and the city of New York. Why should that be so? If the goods are started from Chicago to Pittsburgh, the company may charge as much under the bill as it now stands to Pittsburgh as to New York, but they can charge no more. They can not under the operations of this bill charge any more from Chicago to Pittsburgh than from Chicago to New York, and to that extent it is at least a relief to the city of Pittsburgh; and I take Pittsburgh as the largest town on the great Pennsylvania Railroad. But under the operations of this bill they might charge twice as much for goods, wheat, grain, and all the produce of the great region of Indiana, say from Fort Wayne, or from Cleveland in Ohio, or from the town in which I live, or any other center of commerce there. They might under the operations of this bill charge twice as much on these shipments.

Mr. HARRIS. Or five times as much.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or five times as much between any of these points nearer to New York. Why should that be so? Why should that discrimination be allowed? It is said, however, that if you can fine them or prevent them in any way from making a discrimination against these interior cities you cut them off from competing with the Chicago market. If that argument is good, it ought to exclude this long haul and short haul clause from the bill. But if you admit that no discrimination should be made as between a shipment from Chicago to New York and from some intermediary point to New York, then you must also admit that there should be no discrimination as against a shipment between Fort Wayne and Pittsburgh and New York. It is impossible to stop short of it.

Sir, if this rule as to the long haul and the short haul is to be divided, the same discrimination must extend in favor of all the intermediate points; otherwise you perpetuate and intensify the local complaint that has existed on all the lines of the great railroads. Take the case mentioned by the Senator from West Virginia. At one time there was as much charged from Wheeling to Baltimore as there was from Chicago to Baltimore. Under the operation of this bill railroads might charge as much from Wheeling to Baltimore as from Chicago to Baltimore. Would that be just to that people? If, however, the shipment should be from Chicago to Wheeling, they could not charge any more from Chicago to Wheeling than from Chicago to Baltimore. That is the operation of the bill, and to that extent it goes to correct a complaint which has been made.

But they can still discriminate if the shipment is made from Wheeling to Baltimore, by charging more from Wheeling to Baltimore than they would charge from Chicago to Baltimore.

If there is any justice or any virtue in this principle of attempting by legislation to control the action of railroad companies in fixing their charges from extreme points of shipment, you must also extend the same privilege to all the intermediate points, and say that they shall not charge for a shorter distance more than for a long distance.

It is sometimes said that it costs more to transport for a shorter distance. That is not true. There can not be a case in which it is true. Could it possibly cost more to transport wheat from Mansfield, Ohio, to New York than from Chicago to New York, when the same cars go over the same track 290 miles farther in the one case? Does it cost any more to load in one place than in another? The terminal charges in the great cities are just about as much as it would cost in any interior point on the whole line of the road, and those terminal charges are made special and are usually managed by corporations within corporations, as is done, I believe, in all great cities, in Chicago especially, where the warehouse charge is a distinct thing paid to another company, an organization made by the railroad company, the two combining together for the purpose of cheapening the terminal costs.

For instance, in the city of Chicago there are four or five great railroads of the country combined together into what is called the Fort Wayne depot, and they have an organization, I think a corporation, which manages that business and fixes the charges for the benefit of all the roads. At this very session of Congress you passed a law to make provision for another corporation by which the terminal charges should be still further decreased by combining a greater number of roads and enabling them to make their terminal facilities.

Therefore the question of terminal cost does not enter into the charge for freight at all. That is a special charge made both at the beginning of the shipment and at the end of the shipment, and a charge is made special for that reason. So there is no increased cost to the railroad company because the shipment is made in Chicago, at Fort Wayne, at Mansfield, or at Pittsburgh. The charge would be local in every case, for at the intermediate points the warehouse charge is paid by the shipper and not by the railroad. I do not know that the railroads own a single warehouse. I am not sure that the great Pennsylvania road owns any warehouses at all. The warehouses are owned by private parties and the shipper pays the expenses of the warehouses, or if it is included in the freight charges it is done as a matter of convenience in the process of collecting.

So there is no ground of equity whatever why a discrimination should be made against the intermediate points. Sometimes it is said that the railroads can not afford to run through freight from Chicago to New York unless they do it at a very low rate. If the object is to enable them to run their through freight at the very lowest possible rate at the cost of the local freight, that is a ground of public policy. If that is the ground upon which this bill is to be based, then the fourth section should be stricken out of it entirely, and the railroads should be allowed to fix their own rates for the through freight without respect to local charges.

That was the view that I took of this subject two years ago. I thought we could not legislate upon the subject; that where railroads came in competition with each other and with water transportation it would be better to let them alone; but since that ground is abandoned you must go further and make no discrimination at all. It is sufficient to say that if they charge as much for the short haul as for the long haul, that is a discrimination against all intermediate points; but that nobody proposes to change. But when you go beyond that and say that they may charge twice, three times, or ten times as much from an intermediate point to the point of shipment in the West as they charge from Chicago on the freight from the far West, then as a matter of course you utterly destroy all the industries of the interior towns and cities.

One of the great evils of our times in commercial transactions is the vast concentration of capital and labor in great commercial centers. What has built up Chicago? It is simply because Chicago has enormous advantages over every interior town. Wheat in a warehouse in Chicago is worth more than in any spot in Ohio under the plan heretofore adopted by the railroads. They would charge less in some cases for wheat from Chicago to New York; and the bill will allow them to charge from the interior points of Ohio where it is shipped in great quantities, and the same articles are charged more than is charged from Chicago; so that wheat in Chicago will be worth more than wheat in Ohio.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I have failed to find any such provision in the bill as he speaks of as will permit charging twice, or three times, or five, or ten times as much from an intermediate point as from the termini. Certainly the Senator must infer it from some language used.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. It is here plain as print.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the Senator to point it out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so. In the absence of the provisions of the bill it is plain that the railroads, if left to themselves, can make such charges as they see proper, subject only to the limitations of their charters. Take that broad principle in connection with this language:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction—

If you stop there, then no discrimination could be made; but it goes on—and from the same original point of departure.

If goods are shipped from Chicago to New York is there any prohibition there against charging less for that transportation than for goods shipped from Fort Wayne, Ind., to New York?

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Does he think it would be just or reasonable upon the part of railroads to charge twice or five or ten times as much for carrying wheat from Mansfield to New York as is charged from Chicago to New York?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can answer it. The Senator from New York now refers to a general provision in the bill that they shall not be guilty of extortion. I ask the Senator from New York to read the clause on which he would rely to justify his argument.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will look at section 1 of the bill, lines 27 to 31, he will find the following:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just.

Then, if the Senator will read section 2 he will find that it prohibits special rates, rebates, and drawbacks, prevents any special privileges being granted to any particular person, company, or place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have read all that. Now, let me ask the Senator from New York a question.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would it be reasonable and just to charge more from Mansfield, Ohio, to New York, than from Chicago to New York? I ask the Senator that question.

Mr. MILLER. In that particular case I should say no.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, why do the Senators object to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia? If those words are stricken out, then such a thing could not be done; then no greater amount could be charged from Mansfield to New York than from Chicago to New York. But the very fact that the fight on this bill turns upon these few words shows that the object and meaning is to leave all the intermediate points to a law of justice and discretion to be administered by whom, and when, and where? If you must regulate the long haul and the short haul by legislation, give us a rule that is fair and just, and not by an express exception make a distinction between a short shipment over the same line and a long shipment over the same line. There is the answer, and that is the whole of it.

I intend to vote to support the action of the committee, although I doubt very much whether the fourth section will not bring trouble. I believe that it will be repealed within a short time, and for this reason: I believe the fourth section will create so much embarrassment that it will at once raise the rates of through freight. I appeal to every railroad man who hears me. The companies can not afford to reduce the local rates if by doing that they are prevented from competing at low rates for the through freight. If they are compelled to put on reasonable local freights, then they will be compelled to put on reasonable through freights, and when they attempt to do that, as a matter of course they must raise the freights for long hauls in order to give them even a living profit on their railroads.

Mr. MILLER. I understood the Senator at the beginning of his remarks to say that he is in favor of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am.

Mr. MILLER. That amendment is to make the provision for short and long hauls absolute, starting from any and all points.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. MILLER. That is undoubtedly the meaning.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Senator gets through——

Mr. MILLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if he does not care to be interrupted.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Senator says I am in favor of the same rate per ton per mile over all roads or over the same roads owned by the same persons, he is very much mistaken; but when you speak of the rates through the same places by the same road, the same ownership, I say if you adopt the rule that the long haul shall not be less than the short haul, as a matter of course you must carry it out to its logical sequence. We know very well that this long-haul project has enormously reduced the rates in this country for through freight. It is an advantage which the cities along the Mississippi River and in California have had and enjoyed all the time.

That low charge for through freight is based on the idea that every railroad is built as a local road first, and the local rates are expected to pay what are called the fixed charges; that is, the interest, the cost of the road, and all that sort of thing; and then if they can get through freight for the mere operating expenses, it strengthens the road and enables them to carry on their operations and make money. They therefore have based their charge for through freights, for long freights and long distances, on the mere cost of operating the road. I know that is done on all the great railroads. They have carried freight from Chicago and some of the Western points to the city of New York for less than operating expenses when they were competing with each other, and they usually have fixed those charges at little more than the operating expenses. When I speak of operating expenses I suppose every Senator knows what I mean—the cost of the fuel, repairs to the engines, payment of the engineers and firemen, without any regard whatever to the cost of the road and what are called the fixed charges, the interest on the bonds and the like.

That has been the custom; but if they are compelled to abandon that rule, then, as a matter of course, they will look first to their charges for local freight and adopt their through charges simply so as to keep within the language of the law. In some cases some of the roads will lose all their through freight, and the result will be a general advance in the through freights on the long lines. That will be the effect of it, and when that effect is produced, then gentlemen will come here and complain of it, and say that by the operation of our legislation the freights have been increased from Iowa and the far Western country to New York.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, just in that connection, with the discretionary power which this section gives to the railroad commission, does he not suppose that the commission would make an exception in favor of a road such as he suggests when it was in danger of losing all its through freight?

Mr. SHERMAN. Then if that is so why not leave out these words? If they can make a special rule for freight from Chicago to New York why put in these words?

Mr. HARRIS. I will tell the Senator that I think the words ought to be stricken out, I am for the amendment; but I do not think there are any circumstances under which with the discretionary power which this section gives to the commission any through line would be likely to lose its through freights.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to vote with the committee just as far as I can. If the bill prohibited any discrimination between a shipment from New York to Pittsburgh and a shipment from Chicago to New York, or, vice versa, between a shipment from New York to Cleveland and a shipment from New York to Chicago, if the point of commencement is the same, then the bill operates; but suppose the point of commencement is not the same, but is an intermediate point, why should not the same rule apply?

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Are not the exceptional advantages given to the long haul by railroads necessarily compensated by compelling the intermediate points to make up for that loss, as the Senator says the loss is made up sometimes on the long haul?. Practically do not the intermediate points where the larger charge is have to make up that loss?

Mr. SHERMAN. Railroad men know precisely and can give you to the fraction what proportion of their earnings is from local freight and what proportion is from through freight; and they take care that the local freight, which is almost invariable and changes but little except from the nature of the crops, will pay them at least a reasonable return for the capital employed, the interest on bonds, and the like; in other words, they will make it provide for the fixed charges, and then they will hope to get enough out of the through traffic to help carry on the operating expenses of the road. That is a general rule among railroad men.

Mr. MAXEY. But if the charge on the long haul, as the Senator has said, is sometimes less than the actual cost, and they have the privilege of making a short haul pay a greater rate than a long haul, do they not necessarily compensate themselves by making the short-haul men pay for the loss, and thus the shippers at the intermediate points will be the losers?

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is that this section shall be made logical. The words "and from the same original point of departure" are put in so as to limit the operation of the section and in order to make a discrimination against all interior points. Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania would all be deeply affected by this arrangement, and so with Iowa and other States; where the shipment is from a distance west of Iowa they would be affected by it. It seems to me that it would make the work of the committee more perfect, and these words of limitation are put in here not in the interest of the principle of the section, but for the purpose of defeating it and restraining it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I confess that I am not quite able to understand the position of the Senator from Ohio upon this matter. That is undoubtedly due to my own obtuseness in the premises. If I understood him, two years ago when a similar bill was before the Senate he opposed any amendment to it looking to the control of the long and short haul, but at the present time he proposes to support the proposition as it is now found in the bill. However, if I understood his argument, it was entirely in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia and not in accordance with the provision of the bill.

When I first began to investigate this matter in committee I confess that I was myself disposed to favor the proposition in precisely the same form found in the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia; but after a careful and painstaking investigation of the matter, after listening to the views of a large number of people concerned, shippers as well as railroad men, I came to the conclusion that we could not afford to go further in this first measure than the proposition as found in the bill, that is, limiting the charge for a short haul from the same initial or starting-point and in the same direction. I believe there is no difference of opinion so far expressed in the Senate as to the provision that this limitation should apply to freight moving in the same direction, and therefore it is not necessary to discuss that at all.

It was believed by some of the committee that the provisions contained in the first section, from lines 27 to 31, were sufficient, without any short-haul provision whatever, and that the declaration there made that all charges should be reasonable and just would, if fully carried out and enforced by the commission, result in producing substantially the result which is sought to be brought about by the provision found in section 4, but it was finally concluded that it would be better that there should be some definite declaration upon this question in regard to making the charge for the short-haul no greater than for the long-haul. As a result of that, section 4 was inserted.

It has been assumed, Mr. President, thus far by all the Senators who have discussed this question, or who have spoken in favor of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia striking out the provision as to the initial point and also the provision giving power to the commission to make special exceptions, that this amendment was in favor of the people and against the railroads. I deny it in toto. If that amendment is adopted and that provision is put in there it will increase the earnings of the great railroads of this country 50 per cent. in the next year. Unquestionably so, and that 50 per cent. will all come out of the producers and consumers of this country. There can not be any question about it whatever. Heretofore we have trusted to competition to regulate freight charges in this country. In some directions it has worked well. It has brought about the cheapest railroad freights known in the world. It has reduced the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Dakota to New York to an infinitely small figure. Let that provision prevail as suggested by the Senator from West Virginia, and you will inevitably when the water communications are closed increase the rate of freight upon flour and grain and produce from the West from 50 to 100 per cent.

The railroads will take advantage of that provision, for this law is to apply to every one of the great trunk lines; it does not touch a little side road within the limits of a State; but it touches every one of the great corporations crossing this continent, every great corporation reaching from the Mississippi to the seaboard; and when you say to them all alike substantially, "Your local rates are to be almost in exact proportion to your through rates," the railroad companies will meet you by saying, "We must have such a rate for our through freight as will enable us to earn living dividends upon all the securities which represent our roads, no matter whether they are watered or bona fide." Put in that provision as suggested by the Senator from West Virginia, and you will strike not at the railroads, but you will strike at the farmer in the West and the laboring man in the East. That is where it all comes. You are to double or quadruple the revenues of the railroads of this country, and competition ceases to be a regulator at all.

I am entirely willing to admit that competition has, to a large extent, failed, but we, I think, are not yet ready to legislate here that there shall be no competition at all between the great railroads of this country. Certainly we can not afford to do that unless we go a step further and provide what shall be the rate upon all freights shipped from the West to the East. If the Government is ready to come to the point of fixing the rate upon a bushel of grain from Kansas or Nebraska or Dakota to New York, if it is willing to fix it from every intermediate point, then it may dispense with competition at once and wipe it out. Perhaps we may arrive at a time before long when we may know enough of transportation, when we may understand this problem well enough to do that; but up to the present time competition has worked great benefits to portions of our country. It undoubtedly has, in many instances, worked injustice to individuals and to particular localities, and the committee thought they were going as far as it was safe to go in making the provision found in section 4.

Mr. President, there is nothing in that section—and I submit it to the candid judgment of the whole Senate—which by any inference gives a railroad company a right to charge five or ten times as much for carrying a bushel of grain 1,000 miles as it charges for carrying it 2,000 miles. There is no such inference to be found in the section. This bill simply proposes to say in regard to the short and long haul that the provision shall apply to each initial starting-point. It undertakes to say that if a certain rate is made from Chicago to New York, it shall not be more from Chicago to Pittsburgh than it is to New York over that line; or if a rate is made from Chicago to New York over the Lake Shore and New York Central, that the charge shall not be greater to Albany from Chicago than it is from Chicago to New York city or from any other station along the line. If you will come down to Cleveland, it undertakes to say that the charge fixed from Cleveland to New York city shall not be exceeded by the charge from Cleveland to Poughkeepsie or Hudson, N. Y., or to any other intermediate point; and you are to say in this bill that it shall bear an equal and exact relation to the charge which is made from Chicago to New York.

These long lines of roads reaching from the Mississippi to the seaboard do not belong to any one corporation. There are several lines running from Chicago to Cleveland, for instance, or to some other point and stopping there, and then connecting with another road which goes on to the seaboard. Can you undertake to say that because a road from Chicago to Cleveland, in connection with a road coming east, is willing to take a low rate of freight, and therefore secure to itself the freight from the connecting road, when you go to Cleveland or to some other point where it meets another road, that other corporation shall be controlled in its charges by the charges which the railroad from Chicago to Cleveland was willing to make? Can you do that by this bill or any other? You can not touch the State railroads of this country at all. Mr. President, by this bill you only touch them where they run from one State to another, or where they issue bills of lading carrying produce from one State into another or through one State into another. It is impossible that you shall do this, and I deny again that the proposition contained in section 4 is in the interest of the railroads any more than it is in the interest of the shipper and the consumer; but I say that the other proposition, if it shall be carried out, will absolutely destroy all competition from all points in the West or from all intermediate points.

I stated before in some remarks I made on this bill that this provision in regard to the short and long haul was almost, if not precisely, in the same language as the Massachusetts law; that, in short, the committee substantially copied that law in putting it in here, and in doing it they had the judgment of the commission of Massachusetts upon that point, that it was safe to go thus far and that it was not safe to go further.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] undertook to tell the Senate a few moments ago what Mr. Kernan, of the New York railroad commission, had said, and that the rule adopted by the New York commission was precisely what this provision would be if the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia were to prevail. I undertook to say that the rule adopted by the New York commission is precisely the Massachusetts law—that and nothing more and nothing else. Let me read it.

It is well known here that the State of New York has no law on this subject, but it has an able railroad commission, before whom all complaints go and are heard, and who give recommendations or decisions upon the questions. This commission in carrying on its work has had to make certain rules and regulations governing its own action; and upon this one question it has evolved this rule, and it is a rule upon which it acts and hears all disputes that come before it:

Railroads should not, as a general rule, charge more between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal and a more distant point.

In the bill we have it "from the same original point of departure." That is the language used by the committee in the bill. The language of the New York rule is:

Between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal—

That is, such original starting-point—and a more distant point, even though at such more distant point there be railroad or water competition, unless railroads can affirmatively establish such circumstances governing such competition as justify the higher charge for the shorter distance.

In different language, it is precisely the provision of this bill. We provide that when starting from the same original point of departure the charge shall not be higher.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask the Senator from New York if that is not the exact provision of the bill when amended by striking out "from the same original point of departure?" The bill as amended will be then in exact conformity with the rule adopted by the New York commission.

Mr. MILLER. It will be just as different from it as it is possible for the English language to make it.

Mr. CAMDEN. Where is the difference?

Mr. MILLER. The bill as it now stands says:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the same original point of departure.

The Senator from West Virginia proposes to strike out the words

"and from the same original point of departure." If I understand him, that is the amendment. Now, in place of "the same original point of departure" in the bill as we have it, the New York rule is "between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal and a more distant point." It does not mean going to the same terminal, but it means starting from the same terminal, one of the termini of the road. It seems to me that that is as plain as it is possible to make the English language. Let me read it again:

Railroads should not, as a general rule, charge more between a terminal and an intermediate point, for a like class and quantity of freight, than is charged between such terminal and a more distant point.

That is the terminal in both cases, whether it went a long or a short distance; the one terminal was the same, starting from the same point.

Mr. CAMDEN. It does not say starting at the same point. It says between terminals.

Mr. MILLER. It says between the same terminals.

Mr. CAMDEN. Does it say "the same terminals?"

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will take it and read it, I think he will agree with me as to the construction to be placed upon it. I have not any doubt about it.

I have very little more to say, Mr. President, in regard to this, but I do not propose to have it go uncontradicted here that the amendment as proposed by the Senator from West Virginia is in the interest of the consumer and the producer as against the railroads. I have not any doubt that if that provision should be adopted and carried out it would double the receipts of all the great trunk lines of this country, and that it would be used by the trunk lines as a reason for increasing their through rates. Undoubtedly they would be compelled to make such charges in all cases as would enable them in carrying their way freight to make a proportionate charge, and still make a fair profit upon the value or the cost of the road.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from New York if in his opinion these great trunk lines have been carrying their freight at less than the actual cost of transportation?

Mr. MILLER. I have very little information upon that subject. I have no positive knowledge because I am not in a position to be informed upon it, but if we are to take into consideration the dividends or the want of dividends that have been made upon some roads and the fact that some of them have gone into bankruptcy, we must believe that there must have either been bad management or at times in great railroad wars they have carried freights at less than the actual cost of carrying them.

Mr. HARRIS. If in railroad wars, or under other circumstances, no matter what, railroad companies carry through freight at less than the cost of transportation, does the Senator think that it is right and just that those companies should recoup upon the local traffic and compel the people who are at their mercy, because there is no competition, to make up the loss thus sustained?

Mr. MILLER. Most certainly not, Mr. President. That is one of the evils we are seeking to cure by the passage of this bill; that is one of the greatest evils of the present system of railroading in this country, and I have not any doubt that if this bill as it stands becomes a law, if the commission shall be appointed under the provisions of sections 1 and 2 even if section 4 were cast out of the bill, that evil would to a very large extent be remedied. Certainly I am willing to go as far as the Senator himself in meeting any such evil as that.

Mr. HARRIS. Now, I should like to say a word upon that particular point with respect to the railroad wars, because they induce that condition of carrying freights at less than cost. While a railroad company knows that it may carry through passengers at any rate, to illustrate, from Chicago to the city of New York for $1, yet when it takes up a passenger 5 or 6 miles out of Chicago it can charge him fifteen, or twenty, or twenty-five dollars to recoup for the loss in carrying through passengers; and the same rule applies to freights from Chicago to New York.

If the Senator will consent to strike out this language and assert by the law that the transportation company shall not charge more in the aggregate for the short than for the long haul, he will do a great deal in the line of preventing these cut-throat railroad wars and freight wars that reduce freight rates and passenger rates below the cost of transporting freight and passengers. With this language in the bill, that is the exact effect of it. Take Washington city as the initial starting-point, and you are shipping to the city of New York. Under the provisions of the bill as it stands to-day you can not charge any more from Washington to Philadelphia than you do to New York. You may charge as much. You can not charge any more from Washington to Jersey City than you can to New York. But suppose you want to ship from Baltimore to New York. Under the provisions of the fourth section as it now stands you may charge twice as much, you may charge ten times as much, to ship exactly the same character and the same quantity of freight from the city of Baltimore to New York as you charge from the city of Washington to New York.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator now permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I will.

Mr. MILLER. The floor seems to have changed hands. Does the Senator think that in the case which he has supposed there will be no remedy under the bill as it stands?

Mr. HARRIS. I have said nothing of the kind; but this I will say: If you refer me to another section of the bill to remedy the evil, I protest. Strike out your fourth section altogether, because it is, I will not say worse than useless, but it is quite useless to insist on retaining it in the bill. If it is only to apply to those points going in one direction from the same starting-point, and all the points of shipment between the original starting-point and the final terminus are to be utterly ignored and the rule is not to apply to them at all, I believe I should favor striking it out altogether.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator had much to do with making this bill, and he knows very well that the case which he supposes would come under the clause of being an unreasonable and unjust charge. He is also well aware that under this bill the party making such an outrageous charge would be guilty of extortion and could be punished under the bill whether the fourth section was in or not. The fourth section only goes a step further than the general provision, and undertakes to provide in certain special cases that certain things shall not be done. The Senator thinks it does not go far enough. I think it goes as far as it is wise for us to go at this time. But all these outrageous cases which the Senator has supposed and which the Senator from Kentucky proposed to us this morning, of a charge of $700 a car to a particular distance on the Pacific road, and the case which the Senator from Maryland has supposed, would all be brought under the direct control of the commission. If any person should make a complaint, the commission would investigate it, and they would undoubtedly find that all such charges were unreasonable and unjust, they would find that they were extortionate, and the transportation companies would be punished for making any such unjust or unreasonable discriminations. There is not any question about it under the bill.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from New York will allow me to make a suggestion or two.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I wish first to ask a question. I suppose the Senator from New York will agree that the low rates of tariff on long hauls, say from Chicago to New York, are only as low as they are because of the sharp competition with some other competing common carrier. That being so, and it being agreed that it is not fair to exact exorbitant rates from people at the intermediate points by charging them double and treble what is charged on the long haul, I should like to know how the freight rates can be increased at the long-distance point, when they are brought to the low point they now are by competition and competition alone, as not one penny less is charged now than is absolutely necessary because of competition. Is not the present system of charges based upon the idea that the railroads have the right to take all they can get from all people who have no other means of transportation, and is it not our duty to limit their power and require them to conduct their commercial traffic among the States upon a reasonable and just basis to all the people?

I do not propose to make a speech, but, being on the floor, I desire to say that for a long time the struggle in this body and in the other House was whether Congress had any right, under our power to regulate commerce, to interfere with railroad freights at all. That right was contested, and has been contested, and perhaps will be contested now. This bill if it passes in any form at least establishes that right. I do not desire to go to the utmost limits of the power which I insist Congress possesses; but I desire to vote for some bill that will assert our power and settle our right to interfere when interference is needed.

I have argued this question of long and short hauls before somewhat elaborately, and I do not propose to do it now; but on the 20th of January, 1885, I observe by the RECORD which I hold in my hand that I showed in my speech on that day by reference to an argument made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR], and by a speech of Mr. Daggett, then a member of the House of Representatives, that it was no unusual thing, indeed it was the rule, for the great railroads running from Omaha to San Francisco to charge $300 a car-load from Omaha to San Francisco, and $800 for a car-load precisely similar from Omaha to Virginia City, which is six or eight hundred miles nearer Omaha than is San Francisco on the line of the road.

That state of things seemed to me to be extortion and unjust discrimination which Congress ought to prevent by law. It existed only because of the power that those railroads had to coerce whatever they saw fit out of the people; and I see no reason now, unless the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is adopted, why that road may not have a right to take up a car of freight at Cheyenne and charge $800 to haul it to Virginia City, when it is hauling one exactly like it on the same train from Omaha to San Francisco for $300, unless the words are stricken out which it is now proposed to strike out, "and from the same original point of departure." It is an outrage to charge $800 a car from Omaha to Virginia City and $300 from Omaha to San Francisco for the same car on the same train laden with the same freight. We propose to stop that because they start from the same original point of departure, and yet it is argued that it is wrong to seek to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure." I suppose the railroads want to reserve the right to charge $800 a car still from Cheyenne or any other point to Virginia City, which, under the language of the bill unless amended, they will have the right to do.

I sought to amend the bill of last year. I did not go as far as this proposition goes now. My proposition, the language of which I believe I have here, was—

That no railroad shall charge for hauling over a part of its line more than it charges for hauling over the whole length of the line.

In other words, no charges for any lesser distances should exceed the charges for the whole length of the line. That is a fair proposition. Under it the road might charge from Omaha or Cheyenne to Virginia City $300 if it pleases, but it shall not charge $800 for taking freight from Cheyenne to Virginia City, when it hauls from Omaha to San Francisco for $300; and why it should be allowed, as it will be under the bill unless amended as proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, to charge still $800 for hauling from Cheyenne to Virginia City, limiting it to $300 when it starts from Omaha, which would be several hundred miles farther, I can not comprehend. I only use that case as an illustration; there are doubtless thousands of similar cases. We ought not to allow such unjust discriminations to exist anywhere.

If we are going to do anything, we had better do something that will be effective and that will mean something. It was stated last year and proven before a committee of the other House in an argument by a distinguished lawyer that the Pennsylvania Railroad was at one time hauling coal from the mines of Pennsylvania to Baltimore through the city of York, Pa., 60 miles nearer the mines than Baltimore, and charging from a dollar to a dollar and a half per ton more to leave the coal at York than it charged to carry the same quantity of coal 60 miles farther to Baltimore in the same train and in the same cars.

The result of that was shown to be ruinous to the city of York; no manufacturing establishment could be carried on in successful competition with another which had that advantage in the price of coal, because the dollar and a half a ton on the coal would settle the question between a profit and loss when the competition was sharp, the transactions large, and the profits small. It was shown, too, and proven before the House committee when the Reagan bill was under consideration, that the railroads carry a bale of cotton from Memphis to New Orleans for $1, and charge $3 a bale from Winona, Miss., to New Orleans, which is 120 miles south of Memphis and that much nearer to New Orleans, on the same line.

Why was that? Simply because the road was in competition with other lines by land or water from Memphis, and the railroad sought to make up its profit on its watered stock, or whatever it saw fit to call stock, by charging the people who live along the line and away from other lines three times as much for 120 miles less hauling than it did the people at the end of the line. Yet I think it is fair to assume that it did not reduce its freight from Memphis to New Orleans one cent below what it could afford to carry for.

All that this amendment proposes, as I understand, is that no matter where freight is taken up along the line of a road it shall not charge more than is charged for hauling it over the same road for a longer distance. Surely if the roads are allowed on any part of the road to charge as much as for the whole distance, the railroad can not complain.

If you allow it to charge on any part of the road as much as it does on the whole haul, whether it comes from Cincinnati to New York, or from Chicago to New York, or from Logansport, or anywhere else, that is all it can reasonably ask to be allowed to charge. If Congress is going to do anything to regulate commerce, that much ought to be done.

The suggestion is made that we will break down the railroads by requiring them to haul long distances at low rates. No man will contend that any railroad is hauling from Minneapolis or any other point West to New York now for one penny a ton less than it is compelled to do by reason of competition. There are many elements tending to cheapen transportation and yet allow profits to be made.

An ordinary car to-day can now carry 20 tons as well as it could 10 tons years ago because of steel rails and improved machinery, and the rails will wear ten times as long now as they would before the improved rail was used. That of course brings down the rate of freight, as we all know. There are many other elements that enter into the cheapness of transportation, but I do not propose to argue these questions now. I only desired to say that I shall vote for this amendment. I can see no good reason against it.

I repeat, there never was any good reason why the discrimination I have referred to as existing on the Pacific roads and the Pennsylvania road or the Memphis road should be tolerated. It is not fair, and it ought not to be allowed. If we mean to regulate commerce at all, that is certainly one of the things we ought to prohibit railroads from doing, if we are ever going to curtail their power and assume any sort of jurisdiction over them. If we are going to do anything, let us protect the people who are at their mercy and have heretofore had to pay whatever they saw fit to demand. Unless Congress steps in and says, "You shall not be guilty of extortion on those people simply because you have them in your power," there will be no end to their exactions. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] tends to check them; therefore I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, the case the Senator from Kentucky has propounded of the charge of $300 from Omaha to Virginia City and of $800 from Cheyenne to Virginia City is simply a case which may happen now, but which could not happen if this bill should pass precisely in the shape it is in without any amendment whatever.

In the first place, any such charge would be unjust and unreasonable and it would be extortionate, and it is prohibited under the first and second sections of the bill as a discrimination against places, and it would be unjust and unreasonable. In the case supposed the fourth section undertakes to make a definition of that case, and it provides that railroad companies shall not charge more from Omaha to Virginia City than from Omaha to San Francisco; going on the road two or three hundred miles farther to Cheyenne, the bill would provide that the same railroad company should not charge more from Cheyenne to Virginia City than it charges from Cheyenne to San Francisco, precisely the same rule which held in the first case; and there is no circumstance or condition of circumstances which could arise which would bring about the unjust discrimination which the Senator from West Virginia instances here if this bill should pass. That is just what the bill provides for in the fourth section.

Mr. President, there are many important considerations raised by this question of the long and short haul. The farmers of the West find themselves to-day confronted in the grain markets of the world with grain from India. If it were not for the cheap transportation existing to-day over our trunk lines and through the lakes and by the Erie Canal, we could not export our wheat at all, and if it shall turn out in a few years that India by her improved railways and canals, which Great Britain in her wisdom is building with great rapidity over that great country, shall reduce the cost of carrying a bushel of wheat from India to London 5 or 6 cents, we should find ourselves shut off from that market entirely unless we devise some new way of cheapening transportation from the great grain fields of the West to the Atlantic Ocean. Put in this rigid provision offered by the Senator from West Virginia, stop all competition between our great through lines, and, for almost eight months in the year having no transportation by water, it will be absolutely impossible that we shall ship abroad either wheat or flour, and then the balance of trade which has so long ruled in our favor will turn against us. I need not call to your mind, Mr. President, the terrible effects which came upon this country when for a number of years the balance of trade was greatly against us.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator whether it will not be equally true under the section the committee have reported?

Mr. MILLER. I think not. If I thought so, if I could be convinced that that were true, I would move to strike the section out, for although the farmers of New York and of New England and of all the Middle States have been to a greater or less extent injured perhaps by the too great competition at times of the railroad wars, yet I believe that the people of the East do not desire to have taken away from our people as a whole the power to export our surplus wheat and produce. If the West can not find a market for its vast surplus, then New England, New York, and Pennsylvania will have no market for their manufactured products. We sell our goods to the people of the West, and we consume all that we can and all that we need of their wonderful produce; but if you stop the shipment of the surplus abroad you will break down the entire West, you will break down its whole power to purchase the manufactured products of the East; and it were better for us all that we should be looking toward cheap transportation than that we should in this bill by any provision shut off competition or destroy it.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will show me that this fourth section as it now stands will bring about that result, then, for one, I say I am ready to go against it; but after having considered it for a long time in committee, after having studied over it, I came to the conclusion that this was as far as we could afford to go, that we can go thus far without destroying competition between the railroads themselves, only checking it, and without destroying competition between the railroads and the great water ways of our common country. Further than that I believe it unwise to go.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment to strike out the clause "and from the original point of departure," and leave the fourth section as it stands, prohibiting the charging of more freight on the same road and in the same direction. With that last clause in that section is a perfect snare and delusion, and I do not know for what purpose a provision is inserted here that shall leave certain great points of shipment preserved and protected with all their privileges, and a higher charge made upon every intermediate point between those points of shipment and the market.

Who put in this provision? It is not found in the report of any of the commissioners of any of the States. Who provided that Chicago should be the point of departure, and that every point between Chicago and New York where a shipment was made should be liable to any and every increased charge? But the Senator says the first section covers all this. Sir, I am a plain, matter-of-fact kind of man, and look upon these questions as I see them in actual every-day life. What does the Senator from New York propose?

From Chicago there is a certain price on flour to New York. In the State of Michigan, at an average of one hundred miles east, on two of the great through lines to New York we have splendid water power, and all around it the finest grain-producing region in the world. The southern tier of counties of Michigan all through the country until these railroads pass out of Michigan into Indiana, or from Indiana to Michigan coming from the west, are noted the world over for producing wheat, oats, and all the cereals in abundance and in greater amount to the acre than almost any other part of the world except some of the newer regions.

There we have in Michigan 100 miles east of Chicago, along the lines of two of the great through routes, the Michigan Central and the Michigan Southern and Lake Shore, the finest water-power that can be used to convert wheat into flour. All around we have the material for making the barrels in which to incase that flour and send it to market. And yet for years past and under the provisions of this bill, without this clause being stricken out, the millers of Michigan have been charged so much from Niles and other points in that State for shipping their flour at the rate of five hundred or a thousand barrels a day from the same village to New York, that they have been compelled, in order to transport their flour to New York, to pay the transportation of that identical flour to Chicago, and so from every little town within 100 miles, have it warehoused there, transferred to the railroads there, and there they can make a contract to ship it to New York cheaper than they can ship it from these points easterly over the same road to New York. The additional cost to our citizens there of a transportation 100 miles west in order to get to a competing point in which they can make contracts to ship to the East is a burden. Our farmers who sell their grain to these millers get the price, deducting from it what it costs to ship it back to Chicago and to ship from there to New York, and the same holds good with regard to wheat in the bag or in bulk.

Our farmers can not understand these fine-spun notions of the Senator from New York. They can not understand the fine-drawn arguments of the Senator from Illinois. They can see why from Illinois and from Chicago the Senator might desire to have this bill, but they can not understand how in fairness people advocate such a measure as this when they are compelled to pay at least one-quarter if not one-half more for getting their grain over the same road 100 miles nearer to New York than they do from Chicago.

Mr. MILLER. May I interrupt the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from New York is a bold man and can stand any interruption, but I am a modest man.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from Michigan is challenging the Senator from New York to answer certain questions and will not allow them to be answered.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from New York can wait for a few minutes.

Mr. MILLER. I was simply going to make a suggestion at this time.

Mr. CONGER. I can not understand, and I say the plain farmers of Michigan and the millers of Michigan can not understand these fine-spun notions that arise in the Eastern school and that arise in the Western school. They do not know why there should be a deduction of 10 cents a bushel on the grain raised in Kalamazoo County and in Cass County and in several of those southern counties of Michigan through which these two lines of railroad run, and why there should be 25 cents more charged on a barrel of flour when they are a hundred miles nearer to market and ship it at their own expense back to Chicago and it comes right back over the same road in the same car. They do not understand it, and I do not. I have been in Congress long enough to have heard of all these sophistries and all these makeshift arguments to have my mind confused and twisted about, but I am plain to say that I can not understand what objection there is to allowing the people of Michigan to get the same price for their grain, so far as shipment is concerned, and for their flour 100 miles nearer New York, or why they should be compelled to pay the expenses of shipping it back to Chicago in order to get a rate from Chicago as cheap as the Chicago people have.

Nobody has answered that kind of talk. No man can answer the plain, common-sense question of my constituents who have been asking for years about charges and extortions which they have suffered for years and are suffering to-day.

The railroad men, the representatives of railroad men, do not want the pending amendment made to strike out that clause. The Senator from New York says that it will increase the charges and fill the treasuries of the railroads if the clause is stricken out. That is attacking us from a different quarter from what I suspected; and yet there is not a railroad man on this floor who advocates the striking out. There is not the representative, the acknowledged representative, of a railroad in the Senate nor in the House, there is not a man representing a railroad as one of the great interests of his State except the Senator from New York, who has pretended that the striking out of this clause will fill the treasuries of railroad companies. I can not see how it is possible that it should be so. I believe that this provision in section 4 controlling the prices of freight on the railroads, that there shall be no greater freight for a short haul than for a long one, is in the interest of the farmer, of the wheat-grower, of the corn-grower, of the cattle-raiser. I think it is to the interest of the miller and of the producers of all kinds. I believe it equalizes rates.

My friends here say that taking Chicago, for instance, as a starting-point, we do not complain that half way to New York the railroads charge just as much as they would from Chicago; we do not complain, the people do not complain, to have to pay so much more now than is paid from the terminal point, as it is called, the original point of departure of like freight. The Senator from New York forgets that this same law applies to every road. He says the competition of roads keeps down the prices now, but if you strike out this clause it will raise the prices from every point. He forgets that this measure applies to all roads from all points; that every road leading from Chicago to New York has this application and every road leading from the Mississippi to Chicago has this application. There are certain points where the great grain fields of the West pour out their treasure on certain roads that convey them entirely through to the market or concentrate them in other points. Chicago is a great point, Saint Louis is a great point, Saint Paul is a great point, the points along the Mississippi are great points.

Wherever the produce or like kind of freight starts from any of these far-off points for a common market in Boston or New York this measure applies, and it says you shall not stop in the middle of a State and charge more for carrying freight 100 miles than you do for carrying it 500 miles. The bill as it stands now is in the interest of the great cities of the West and it is against the rural districts everywhere. There are a great many people in the cities. They sow not, neither do they spin. All between these cities and all through are the farmers, the laboring men, the men who toil, and whose labor brings from the earth the bountiful productions of nature, and then the cities reap the reward in the exchanges and transfers and the accumulations which they take from the rural districts in excessive charges.

But I need not dwell upon that. The Senator from Ohio presented that matter very fairly, as the Senator from Kentucky has done, and the Senator from Maryland, and the Senator from West Virginia who presented this amendment.

Some Senators say it is enough that we have in the first section of the bill a general saving clause. General saving clauses are beautiful things to lean back upon and repel any attempt to make safe and sound and decisive provisions in a bill. What good does that general clause about excessive charges and extortions do to the man who labors in the grain field and in his mill all the year round in my State, if there are two or three or five or ten times the charge made by a railroad upon his products, so that he is compelled to sell cheaper in Michigan than he would in the far-off corner of Dakota? What good does it do to him? Does the observation or experience of any man show that it is a profitable business to engage in combating a railroad company? Is that the place for the laboring man, for the small shipper, or the producer to contest his rights?

Sir, it is holding out a hope that there is some law passed which will protect the rights of men when you refer them to a general provision in a law that a railroad company shall not make unjust charges. How can they follow it up in the courts? With the diminished price of their wheat and flour, what surplus money have they to follow up railroads or go before commissioners, or bring suits to recover back the extortionate charges which have been made?

Sir, I want a law that plain people can understand, and I want a law which will protect the common man in the United States and in my State. The rich can take care of themselves. Corporations can fight against corporations. The time has come in this country when generalities, glittering or otherwise, will not satisfy the demands of the people. The time has come when, if Congress undertakes to pass a law for the benefit of the community, it must be positive, decisive, incisive, direct, plain, and easily understood. That is what we want here.

This professes to be a law to govern railroads and to protect the community against them, not to protect railroads against each other. There is nothing in the whole bill that protects one railroad against another. They can take care of themselves. There are provisions in the bill, and I call the attention of Senators now in these brief remarks to them, which attempt to make every boat and every vessel which carries freight which has been brought by a railroad, or which at the end of its voyage shall be taken to a railroad, come under the provisions of the bill as a common carrier. It is dangerous; it is insidious. At the proper time I intend to consider those clauses of the bill. I am now speaking in reference to the pending amendment, and I approve of it most heartily. I had an amendment which I was about to propose in a different form, but which would accomplish the same object. Much as I desire to support some bill as good as we may frame it, without this amendment I shall not only vote against the bill itself, but will oppose it with all my power. There is no threat in that; I am but one among the great mass, but my vote is within my own control.

There are other provisions in the bill in regard to water transportation, and I say that if all the railroad presidents of the great through lines in the United States had assembled together in common council and had sat for weeks to devise the best means of destroying the competition of water transportation they could not have done it more effectively than is done in this bill. I made some comments upon the general provisions of the bill as to all kinds of vessels and in regard to an amendment to the bill as to all kinds of water communication from the greatest to the lowest. The bill provides that wherever transportation is partly by rail and partly by water in a continuous transportation, no matter if the vessel is a single hooker owned by a man, or whether it is part of a line, a permit shall be obtained from these commissioners to carry that load of grain.

Every vessel on our lakes that takes up freights that would come on a railroad, if they are going to a foreign country or if they are going to another place where a railroad shall continue to carry it, is subject to all the conditions of the road. A railroad would desire nothing better than to lay the cold steel grasp of the law upon water transportation, just as in the winter the cold frost binds up the lakes and the rivers of the North. This is better than frost; this is better than ice; this brings the water transportation of the country under the control of the same law and the same regulations as the railroads themselves. During the summer season, on account of the lakes, the transportation by rail is reduced to such a low limit that it is admitted that it is scarcely profitable to carry the grain. This bill will compel the freights on vessels to be even all through the line, necessarily so, and it gives the railroads the control of that competition which has proved so valuable to the whole United States.

Sir, we have paid out in the last thirty years nearly $200,000,000 in one form or another, either by improving rivers, improving harbors, building light-houses, or deepening channels. In all the ways that we may benefit navigation, the Government has paid out over $200,000,000 to improve our water communication all over the United States—the waters that empty into the Atlantic, the waters that empty into the Pacific, the waters that empty into the Gulf, the waters that enter into the great lakes.

Wherever there was a highway which nature and nature's God had provided as the highway for the citizen, rich and poor, to use alike with his own vessel and in his own mode of transportation, we have paid out these hundreds of millions to improve it and make transportation cheaper, and are doing it day by day and year by year. In my judgment, there has been no expenditure of money of the United States from the commencement of the Government until now which has been so abundantly useful and desirable to the great mass of the people of the United States as all these expenditures and appliances to make safe and comfortable and cheap the water navigation of this country. To-day, and in all the days to come, whether cars shall be propelled by steam, or whether some more powerful and cheaper motor can be invented by which half the expense of that transportation may be reduced through all time to come, in this land of ours and on this continent of ours the water communications, the highways of the people, the easements upon which they may go in their own craft, in their own manner, free as the air, will be the great enemies of monopolies; they are the great protection of the people against the extravagance of monopolists and of extortionists.

This bill by one fell sweep places that under the control of commissioners, with a requirement that everybody who goes upon those highways shall have a license, and punishes by fine of from $500 to $5,000 any man who dare go upon these great water communications without a license. If the bill passes with the provision in it which it is proposed here to strike out, and if it passes without an amendment in regard to the control of the water courses of the country, I say to Senators there is no need of passing any more river and harbor appropriation bills. I say there is no need of erecting the beacon-light to warn vessels from the rocks and the shoals; there is no need of deepening the channels of rivers or making harbors on our lakes; there is no need of trying to hem in the swelling banks of the Mississippi; there is no need to keep open the mouth of the Mississippi River, which is the great inlet to an empire of wealth and of produce.

Commerce would stagnate, the business of all this country would be prostrated. This bill would do it. Talk about having in a year or two to make insignificant provisions in the bill! I tell gentlemen that within one year, but one season of navigation need pass when the universal voice of the people would cry out against this trammeling of their rights of travel upon the rivers without a license from paid commissioners, commissioners paid $10,000 a year even, to impose upon the people of this country those restrictions in using their own natural highway which they have now and have had from the beginning.

How different is this provision in the bill about crippling the commerce of the lakes and of the rivers and restricting it to the license and control of these commissioners from the wise provisions of those men who passed the ordinance of 1787. They said in all that country every navigable stream, ay, they did not even confine it to the common-law definition of a navigable stream; they said all the waters in the great northwest territory flowing into the Gulf of Saint Lawrence or flowing into the Gulf of Mexico (and that comprised all the waters and rivers of that territory) should forever be free to the inhabitants of the territory, forever free from every restriction and from all restrictions. More than that, in order that the passage might be uninterrupted by rivers and down rivers the same ordinance says, "and the carrying places between them." Even the portages, by the organic law of the land constituting the great northwest, which now are so many great States, provided that all the streams in that territory and the carrying places between them should forever be free to the inhabitants thereof.

The provisions of this bill curtail, cripple, gnaw into, and destroy, and will be made a subject of lawsuits, a subject of criminal prosecutions for every man who may take grain which has been brought by rail to any lake or to any river and carry it into the line of transportation toward the seacoast and where another railroad can take it up. If he ventures to carry grain to a foreign port on the lakes the owner or master of the boat is liable to arrest and fine and imprisonment for carrying it there.

Oh, sir, if the people of Illinois and Iowa and Michigan and Minnesota and all the Southern States which have these great rivers running through them could only know what evils are contained in that little clause connecting water courses with railroads in a bill solely and professedly made by their command to govern and regulate railroads, it would not be a nice country for Senators who vote for it to pass through. The people would not touch them. The very scorn which they would put upon them, the indignation, the sullen pointing of the finger would make a man unfit for his duties here who did it, and would make him unfit for happiness anywhere. But they do not understand this bill, and I am not able at this time to meet all the sophistry and all the eloquence of the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Illinois with which it is imposed upon other Senators here. If there be time I intend to analyze those provisions more in their order on some other occasion. I throw off this little note of warning to those who will couple the water transportation to the railroad systems as they are coupled in this bill, and say that if the bill passes, when it is understood, they had better hang their harps upon the willows that run by the rivers and sing the doleful song that despairing men do sing who have to meet an enraged constituency.

I have said all I want to say on this subject just now, and until to-morrow or some future occasion, for I take it this bill will hardly be in a situation to be adopted for some days if not weeks hence, unless there are very radical changes made in it. I merely make these little fugitive suggestions for the consideration of those bold men who with so wild and firm a grasp would lay their hands upon the people's highways and water communications of the country, and chill them worse than frost and worse than ice.

Mr. MILLER. It is not the first time, sir, that the Senator from Michigan has by intimation and by innuendo charged Senators upon this floor with representing monopoly interests. He stated at the opening of his remarks that no Senator who represented corporations and monopoly interests here had either moved to strike out or favored the striking out of the provision in the fourth section relating to the initial starting-point. I wish the Senator would deal not in intimations and not in innuendoes. I think it hardly fair that he should do it. If he desires to charge any one, and particularly if he desires to charge me, with representing upon this floor any monopoly or any corporation interest or any interest rather or other than that of my whole constituency, I want him to be bold enough to do it openly and by name, and then I shall properly answer him. Until he does that, I refuse to recognize or to answer either insinuation or innuendo.

The Senator, passing on from that, has misrepresented this bill in almost every feature. There is no provision in it calling for a license upon any vessel or boat floating upon our lakes or our great rivers. There is no such provision in it. The Senator has simply repeated the speech which he made the other day against the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] providing that licenses should be granted. There is nothing of the kind in the bill whatever, and I commend to the Senator that before he again indulges in a tirade of that kind upon this measure he carefully read the bill so as to know what its provisions are, rather than that he stand up here and put into the RECORD and into the history of our Government a denunciation of a measure which has come from an honorable committee of this body, when it contains none of the provisions which he has declared it does contain. I am ready to meet fair, open, straightforward argument upon this measure at any and all times. If I am convinced, as I said in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that this fourth section would do anything to prevent our holding the foreign market, as an Eastern man, as an American citizen, I am ready to strike it out.

If the Senator would know why it is that freight is carried cheaper from Chicago to New York than it is from some interior town in his own State, he has but to look at the river and harbor bills, in which he, more than any other Senator, has been instrumental in getting large appropriations for improving the lakes, and particularly the St. Clair Flats and the Lime Kilns, by which it has been made possible that great ships should float over our lakes and down to Buffalo, carrying two and three thousand tons of freight. It is these appropriations which have made it possible; and would you say to the railroad companies that because you have thus improved the lakes and because the State of New York has furnished a royal highway from the lakes to the ocean and has finally made it free without charge, therefore the railroads should not come in and carry any of the freight from the great Mississippi Valley to the ocean? If you desire to do that, very well, do it, and thus cripple and destroy our foreign commerce, for if by this provision you strike down railroad competition from the great points in the West, you will do what? Instantly one will raise the rate of freight upon the lakes, because you will turn all the grain and all the produce of the great Northwest down the Mississippi Valley and upon the lakes, and of course the law of supply and demand upon the shipping of the lakes will come in and control the rate of freight. It can not be otherwise.

Undoubtedly great injustice has been done to localities and to interior points by our railroads up to the present time. This bill is the outgrowth of an attempt to prevent that. The committee honestly believe that it will to a large extent do it. Whether it will do it absolutely or not, I am not prepared to say. The case which the Senator supposes of shipping flour or grain from Grand Rapids or some other point in Michigan to Chicago and shipping back through Buffalo is only because there is rapid and cheap water trausportation by the great lakes; but that the railroads should charge more from Grand Rapids to New York than they charge from Chicago to New York is wrong, of course, and I have no doubt that under the provisions of this bill that wrong will be righted.

Perhaps we may discover somewhat the animus of the Senator from Michigan upon this question when we remember some of his speeches upon the river and harbor bill heretofore, when he has told us that his own State had as large if not more seacoast, if I remember correctly, than is to be found upon the whole Pacific or Atlantic coast taken together. Almost every important point of Michigan is touched by the lakes, and Michigan more than any other State can do without any railroad competition; it can do without any railroad control, for it has to go but a litte distance to find a seaport or a lake port from which, through the generosity of New York, it may get the grain to the Atlantic ports and to Liverpool cheaper than any other State in the Union.

But what shall we say of Dakota, what shall we say of Kansas, and Nebraska, and many other of the interior States, which have neither rivers nor forests? Is there to be no protection for them? Is there to be no honest effort in this bill to somewhat regulate the railroad transportation of this country and to see to it before an honest and able commission that there shall be no unjust discriminations? The people of the interior and the great West are interested in this question more than the people of Michigan, and I know that they through their representatives as they came before the committee were most anxious that there should be some control of this kind.

The bill does not undertake in any way to compel the steamers or the sailing vessels upon our great lakes or upon our great rivers to submit to the control of the commission except as they form a continuous line with a railroad company. It is believed by all the committee that such a control as that is just and proper, for many of our great through lines strike the lakes at Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, and other points, and by running their own great vessels, plowing the lakes, they make a continuous line to Milwaukee, to Chicago, to Duluth, or to any other point upon the lakes; and if the commission does not take hold of the whole through line, then the commission will be of no use whatever and can have no control whatever.

But the bill does not undertake to require any of the steamers, or any of the sailing vessels, or any of the fishing smacks, or any of the boats which engage as common carriers in this country to procure a license from the commission before they can do business. I can only believe that when the Senator from Michigan made this charge he made it innocently, thinking that the amendment to which he spoke the other day was actually in the bill. But there is no such provision in it.

Mr. President, I have said what I have because I felt the language of the Senator from Michigan as unjust to myself, as unjust to all the members of the committee, who labored long and hard the whole summer to get at the views of the leading shippers and the producers and consumers of the country. This bill is the result of their work. It may not be perfect; doubtless it is not perfect; but it is an attempt to see that justice is done to all our people in connection with the great railroad corporations of the country.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. I desire, if the Senator from Texas will permit me, to read one clause, as I have been attacked for making a statement here which is not in the bill. I will occupy but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. COKE. It is now growing late, and——

Mr. CONGER. I will only read two or three clauses, without comment, in answer to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COKE. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. CONGER. The bill says:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used for a continuous carriage or shipment.

Not a continuous line, a continuous control, nor anything like that, but where the same freight goes partly by rail and partly by water.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the Senator see that the provision does not apply either to railroad or to water communication, but to common carriers?

Mr. CONGER. It applies to the common carrier who carries anything, but is proceeding partly by rail and partly by water. It applies to a carrier by water. Perhaps I made a mistake in speaking of a license. That was not intended, but it provides that—

If any common carrier shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its tariffs of rates, fares, and charges as provided in this section, or any part of the same, such common carrier shall be—

Liable to suit. It also provides that any such common carrier taking freight from one place to another partly by rail and partly by water may become liable if he violates any of the provisions of the bill to a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment. The Senator says I have mistaken this bill entirely. What odds is it whether it is a license or not if it is made subject to the provisions of the bill? I will leave to any one to read the bill to see who is right.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. Before the Senator from Texas makes his motion I simply desire to announce, as the session is rapidly passing away unless we mean to sit here through the hot weather, that I shall insist to-morrow on continuing here until we dispose of the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMDEN, it was Ordered, That the papers on file granting a pension to J. S. Hall, by special act of Congress, passed June 18, 1878, be withdrawn, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of George Brown be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, subject to the rules of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

D. Frank Bradley, of South Carolina, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of South Carolina.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 871) of D. Frank Bradley, of South Carolina, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of South Carolina, in place of Ellery M. Brayton, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that D. Frank Bradley is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Ellery M. Brayton, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 17, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Ellery M. Brayton, late collector of internal revenue for the district of South Carolina, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions.

But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Bradley.

August H. Kuhlemeier, of Iowa, to be collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 851) of August H. Kuhlemeier, of Iowa, to be collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Iowa, in place of John W. Burdette, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that August H. Kuhlemeier is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of John W. Burdette, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Kuhlemeier.

Robert W. Banks, of Mississippi, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Mississippi.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1297) of Robert W. Banks, of Mississippi, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Mississippi, in place of James Hill, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Robert W. Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Banks.

William C. Thompson, of Iowa, to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1290) of William C. Thompson, of Iowa, to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Iowa in place of John W. Green, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that William C. REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected April 21, 1886.

Frank W. Beane, of Salt Lake City, Utah, to be register of the land office at Oxford, Idaho.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington.

On motion of Mr. BEACH, the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as related to the introduction of bills and resolutions was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report of Mr. Somerville P. Tuck, appointed to carry out certain provisions of section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801," approved January 20, 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1886.

PAUL BONAVERIS VS. THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of an appropriation to pay judgment in the case of Paul Bonaveris vs. The District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

YTURBIDE LAND CLAIM, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico upon the private land claim of Santa Tomas de Yturbide, No. 139, New Mexico; also report of the present surveyor-general upon the same; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS NOT PROVIDED FOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a list of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury for which appropriations have not been made, with reports of War and Navy and Post-Office Departments, claims by the Second Comptroller and Sixth Auditor, respectively; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a statement showing the amount expended for chemical division in the laboratory from the appropriation for the present fiscal year and the balance unexpended; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, with inclosure, asking an appropriation to supply deficiency in the appropriation for contingent, Bureau of Ordnance, for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY CUSTODIANS AND JANITORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an amended estimate of an appropriation for pay of assistant custodians and janitors to supply deficiency in the appropriation for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVENWORTH MILITARY PRISON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Adjutant-General, and recommending that authority be given to use the surplus of appropriation for the Leavenworth military prison for the current fiscal year to make up deficiencies in other items; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CABLE AT BUCK ISLAND BAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Chief Signal Officer in regard to the submarine cable at Buck Island Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH E. MENDENHALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of order and findings of fact by the court in the case of Sarah E. Mendenhall, administratrix, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ROBERT H. WALTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of order and findings of fact by the court in the case of Robert H. Walton vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SARAH M'FERRIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of order and findings of fact by the court in the case of Sarah McFerrin vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JOHN M. CAMPBELL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of order and findings of fact by the court in the case of John M. Campbell vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JAMES C. JENKINS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of order and findings of fact by the court in the case of James C. Jenkins vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SECTION 3336 REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (the bill having been returned from the Senate with an amendment).

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to ask that this amendment of the Senate be taken up and concurred in.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 17, after the word "bond," insert "once in four years and."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the amendment of the Senate; which was concurred in.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2239) extending the time for the completion of the records of the clerk of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and the transfer of the same to the Department of State; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COLLINS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask unanimous consent that this bill be now taken up and passed. It is necessary that it should become a law before this month expires, in order to insure the winding up of the business of this court.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the powers of the clerk of the late Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, as extended by section 2 of the act of Congress relating thereto, approved June 3, 1884, be, and they hereby are, extended for an additional period, not to exceed two months from and after the 30th day of April, 1886, for the purpose of closing up the business of his office, and for depositing the records, documents, and all other papers of the court or its officers in the office of the Secretary of State, as provided in the act re-establishing said court and the act therein referred to, and said clerk is hereby authorized to employ such assistants as he may deem necessary for the purpose of enabling him to carry into effect the provisions of this act, not to exceed in number those heretofore employed, said assistants to be paid monthly, at the same rate of compensation heretofore paid them, on vouchers certified by said clerk, under the direction of the Secretary of State, from said Geneva award fund; and all disbursements shall be made by said clerk, under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I think we should have some explanatory statement in regard to this measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is desirable to know whether we have now reached a point where the expenses of this court are to be paid out of the Treasury instead of being paid out of the Geneva award fund.

Mr. COLLINS. The expenses are to be paid out of that fund.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Massachusetts can make a brief explanation before the request for the consideration of the bill is submitted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. The act of 1882 re-establishing this Court of Alabama Claims requires that the record be made up by the clerk and transmitted to the Secretary of State, and that the moneys be paid by the accounting officers of the Treasury upon the report of the Secretary of State. It is physically impossible to complete the record and transmit the papers within the time now limited by law. This bill is identical with the first section of a bill which passed this House unanimously a few weeks ago. The Senate is now engaged in the discussion of the other provisions of that bill. The creditors of this fund desire the passage of this measure. It is utterly impossible to close up the business of the court unless this additional time be given.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the last clause of the bill in regard to the payment of these employés be again read.

The Clerk read the provision referred to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the expenses under this bill are to be paid out of the Geneva award fund, I do not know that I care to object.

Mr. RANDALL. But why should Congress unnecessarily continue clerks to be paid out of a fund which does not belong to the Government of the United States?

Mr. COLLINS. The continuance of these clerks for the time prescribed is necessary; and they ought to be paid out of the fund, not out of the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. When is this organization to cease?

Mr. COLLINS. The last day of June.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HAYDEN, to attend to important business.

To Mr. DORSEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to file the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 8104) to forfeit lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Marquettee to Ontonagon, in said State; and the same was ordered to be printed with the majority report.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] states that on the 15th of December last he presented a petition of Jacob F. Chandler and others, concerning unpaid balances and bounties, &c., which was referred to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. No such committee was authorized at the present session, and if there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEELE. I ask, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to call up for present consideration the resolution in reference to the business of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRAGG submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Tuesday and Wednesday (4th and 5th of May next), after the expiration of the morning hour on each of such days, be, and are hereby, set apart for the consideration of such general bills as may then be upon the Calendars of the House reported from the Committee on Military Affairs—consideration to be in the order designated by the committee, and not to interfere with general appropriation bills."

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object to that resolution unless there is added to it a provision that it is not to interfere with prior orders.

Mr. STEELE. I will modify the resolution in that way—that if we can not have a day, we shall have an evening session on each of those days.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object to the resolution if it be modified as I have suggested.

Mr. HENLEY. Let me inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the resolution covers the case of non-interference with land-grant-forfeiture bills?

Mr. CUTCHEON. All prior orders are excluded.

Mr. HENLEY. If it does not interfere with those forfeiture bills I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HENLEY. Yes; I object.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman is too late with his objection.

Mr. HENLEY. The case of the forfeiture of land grants is provided for by amendment to the rules.

Mr. STEELE. We do not propose to interfere with those prior orders.

The SPEAKER. It is not a permanent amendment to the rules, but only an amendment directing the order of business during this session. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the House.

Mr. STEELE. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that a recess be had at 5 o'clock p. m. to 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. on each of said days, and one evening session had to be devoted to said purpose.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House, and the gentleman from Indiana has the right to move the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. STEELE. I think the Clerk read it "evening sessions;" it ought to be one evening session, and not "evening sessions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

LEVI JONES.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I move, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4629) for the relief of Levi Jones, and that it be put upon its passage.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Paymaster-General is hereby directed to pay Levi Jones, late first lieutenant of Company B, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry from the 1st day of October, 1863, to the 1st day of May, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALIENS HOLDING PROPERTY.

Mr. BENNETT (by Mr. OATES, of Alabama), by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3183) to prohibit aliens from acquiring title to or owning lands within the United States of America; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OATES, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and send to the Clerk's desk a marked paragraph which appeared in the Cleveland Press, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORAN denies that in the House committee he expressed a desire that the labor troubles should be settled in blood. O'NEILL swears that FORAN did express these sentiments.

D. S. B.

Mr. FORAN. I never knew, Mr. Speaker, that I was such a bloodthirsty individual as I am by this paragraph made to appear. It contains a very grave charge. I am charged with having expressed in the House Committee on Labor the sentiment that I desired, that I wanted, that I wished the labor troubles now disturbing this country should be settled by the shedding of blood, by murder, by rapine, everything that this sanguinary language implies.

It is true the reporter for this paper, Mr. Barry, said that I denied having made the statement; but he also alleges that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] swears that I did utter these sentiments. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that these words, telegraphed by this reporter to the paper he represents, and no doubt in perfect good faith, were inspired by some remarks made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] in the House, and which do more credit to the impetuosity of his temperament than to the maturity of his judgment, during the debate upon the Crain arbitration bill, and I will send to the Clerk's desk what the gentleman then said on April 3 on the floor of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

I see men on this floor pretending to represent labor organizations, who stand back and say, "We favor neither compulsory arbitration nor voluntary arbitration," I say they are men who know in their hearts that their true sentiment is that these issues can only be settled by blood. That is their judgment, and they have so stated.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who made these remarks admitted the following day in the committee that he alluded to myself; and he subsequently promised to make such correction upon the floor of the House as would be proper and honorable in the premises, having been assured and apparently satisfied that he was mistaken in the statement. He said in committee that he did not base his statement upon remarks I had made, or upon anything that had occurred in the Committee on Labor, but upon statements made to him outside the committee, and, as I was afterward informed by the gentleman, by a newspaper correspondent who goes by the name and under the title of Judge Noah. This legal and law-learned gentleman is, I believe, the reporter of the Chicago Herald. I addressed this ark of truth [laughter] a letter, and he says in reply, in a letter dated April 10, among other things, what I now read:

Your first note, requesting me to answer whether I had stated to Mr. O'NEILL that you had said to me that "the only solution of the labor problem was the shedding of blood," was a proper inquiry, and I replied, so soon as it was received, that you had not employed that language, and that I had not so stated to Mr. O'NEILL, detailing what you did state in my presence.

What Judge Noah claims I did say may be gleaned from a letter received from him April 15, from which I read:

No. 1420 NEW YORK AVENUE, Washington, April 15, 1886.

HON. M. A. FORAN, M. C.:

SIR: I have yours of the 13th to-day. I wish you to distinctly understand that at no time and under no circumstances did I ever attribute to you the desire or expressed wish that bloodshed should follow, by reason of your remark that the only solution of the labor difficulties was to "let them fight it out." It was my conclusion, not yours, that "fighting it out" might result in violence and bloodshed. This I have previously sought to convey to you, and I am not satisfied to be placed in a false position. I did not so state to Mr. O'NEILL, nor have I ever charged to anybody that "bloodshed" underlaid your proposition to let the parties "fight it out." The inference was Mr. O'NEILL's. I drew no inference, save in respect to the troubles in Texas.

I have no recollection of having used in committee the language, "Let them fight it out;" but if I did, the language was used in the same sense in which I would use the words if I said there was a fight in this House over the passage of a bill; not in any sense that could possibly imply violence. However, I concluded to let the matter drop. I did not intend to give it any attention whatever, and for the simple reason that I believed the members of this House were well informed and acquainted with the peculiar and salient characteristics of the gentleman from Missouri, who is, upon the whole, a pretty good fellow, but who by nature is somewhat mercurial in his disposition, and is sometimes carried, unintentionally, perhaps, beyond the point which he intends and aims to reach. A good deal like a good base-runner, he is so anxious to score a home run, that he keeps on running, forging ahead, and bounds along in wild, impetuous flight from base to base, even after the umpire has cried out, "Foul ball!" [Laughter.] So I paid no attention to the matter at all until the press of my city and district published his statement, which publication made it worse than the original—a good deal like the story of the three black crows.

The first statement, the one made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], that I had said that the only solution of the labor problem was the shedding of blood, when it got to Cleveland, my home, became enlarged to the extent that I desired and wanted to see bloodshed in the settlement of labor troubles. I then stated to the gentleman from Missouri, in view of these publications, that some statement or correction ought to be made, and told him that I would rise in my seat on the following morning, that being Monday, immediately after the Journal was read and approved. But the gentleman was not in his seat on Tuesday morning after the Journal had been approved. I met him again the next day. He said that he had some business in New York, and would not be back until Wednesday.

I said then that Wednesday would satisfy my purpose just as well. On Wednesday, however, he was not here. Then I stated to him when I saw him that Friday or Saturday would do; but I understand the gentleman got sick, for he was not here on either of those days. I then concluded to drop the matter entirely, but some gentleman outside, I think a reporter for the New York World, asked me why I did not make a statement which would go to the whole country in justice to myself. I replied that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] did not seem disposed to give me the opportunity. That statement, to my regret and surprise, was published in the New York World.

Nobody could be more concerned than I was about its publication, for there is no man upon this floor or elsewhere who has less desire for newspaper notoriety than I, or who says less to reporters about his colleagues than I do. In fact, I give newspaper correspondents a wide berth at all times. [Laughter.] As I have already said, I concluded to let the matter drop; but on yesterday morning some anonymous coward (I think I know the handwriting, although I am not sure) sent me this slip, which I understand is taken from the Missouri Republican); I am so informed and believe, though I am not positive. It was torn off just as you see it and inclosed in an envelope, and sent to me, without signature or other evidence to disclose the identity of the generous, manly sender.

I will read:

The basis of FORAN's complaint is to be found in the following passage in the course of O'NEILL's remarks on March 31: "When I see men on this floor who stand back and say, 'We favor neither compulsory arbitration nor voluntary arbitration,' they are men who in their own hearts believe that these issues can only be settled by blood." He turned and looked directly at FORAN as he said this, and everybody knew that FORAN was the target shot at.

I did not see the gentleman look at me at the time. I suppose if he had looked at me I would have wilted and melted away. [Laughter.]

But I read further:

One of the Cleveland papers rubbed it in by referring directly to him by name, and it is his understood purpose to repudiate the sentiments attributed to him. That is where the fun will begin, as it seems to be pretty well established that O'NEILL spoke by the card and that he has armed himself with documentary evidences to confirm his declaration if it is called in question to-morrow.

Now, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that neither in committee nor out of committee, in this House nor outside of this House, have I ever uttered a sentence or a word that could be tortured or twisted into any such construction as that. And if the gentleman from Missouri has documentary evidence to confirm these statements I would like to have it presented now. This is the time, the accepted time. I pause for a reply.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Missouri will take the floor when the gentleman from Ohio gets through.

Mr. FORAN. The gentleman from Missouri perhaps after all wants to act the part of the old woman, and have the last word. [Laughter.] All right; he can enact that rôle; it suits him.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have been waiting a long time to get a word from you.

Mr. FORAN. Very well. I desire to offer my apology to the gentleman from Missouri for having said anything to a newspaper reporter that would indicate that he was not disposed to give me an opportunity to set myself right on this question. I did not know that he was sick. But I find in the New York Star of April 17, and this is the basis of my apology, the following:

His greatest effort in Congress was the passage of the arbitration bill, which has of late brought him so prominently before the public. Mr. O'NEILL is not more than forty years old, and is tall and slender, with a very graceful carriage.

[Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Read it all. There are some very good points in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAN. I will read it all.

One of the Congressman's old Saint Louis friends visited him yesterday afternoon and found him completely exhausted—

I was not aware of that—

His eyes were sunk far back in his head and his face was pale. "It is simply overwork," he said, "and I had to give up. I quietly stole away from Washington that I might seek rest and quiet. When I came here I intended to take the boat to Boston, but I was not feeling strong enough. I hope to go to-morrow. I have not been even able to read the morning papers. The work of getting my bill through Congress required a great effort. It called for all my energy, and now a reaction has set in."

[Great laughter.]

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], who wrote the bill and who is its author and who really engineered it through the House, did not break down. He was around as usual the days following this terrible strain.

"My bill?" What says the gentleman from Texas to that? "My bill!"

How big was Alexander, pa,
That people called him great?

[Laughter.]

If I had known the gentleman was so much indisposed—that he was so badly afflicted with malaria—I would not have made the remark I did to the gentleman I have referred to, and I did not intend it to be published at the time. I know the effort by the gentleman was a very great one. Some weeks ago he came over here from New York, where he had been, with an arbitration bill which he said had been written by Judge Christy, of this city—a compulsory one—in his pocket, believing, as Victor Hugo said of the battle of Waterloo, that it would effect a change of front of the universe. [Laughter.]

But there has been no change of front yet. The planets have been whirling along through space just the same as they have always done. [Laughter.]

Now I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I never made use of these remarks, and the statement that I did was wholly gratuitous and as false as it was unmanly and ungenerous. I desire to further say that any gentleman upon this floor who would say that he believed the only solution of the labor problem was in the shedding of blood would be an idiot. He certainly could never have studied the problem, and the man who would say he desired to see the labor problem or the labor troubles of this country settled by the shedding of blood would be unworthy of the confidence of an intelligent constituency and unfit to hold a seat on the floor of this House. [Applause.] And I say this with all due deference to my friend from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER], who desired—did not desire, but thought perhaps it might be a good thing if Jay Gould was hanged to a lamp-post without trial by judge or jury or even benefit of clergy [laughter]; for I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois meant that. And I desire to say that when I made that statement I did not mean any reflection, so far as he is concerned, for, though he too is somewhat mercurial, I believe he is a man of honest intentions and good motives.

But there is something else in this slip from the Saint Louis paper which I might as well read. Let me say right here that Mr. Barry, who penned the paragraph he sent to the Cleveland Press, in answer to a personal request made by me, said he derived his information from a reporter of a Saint Louis paper, whose name I afterward learned was Mr. Knapp, and this gentleman stated to Mr. Barry that he got it directly from Mr. O'NEILL, and from whom he claims he obtains all that transpires in the Committee on Labor.

Mr. Knapp is, I suppose, the author of the allusions in the Missouri Republican which I have just read, and which were no doubt inspired by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Before I pass on I desire to now say if there is a gentleman on the Committee on Labor now on the floor who ever heard me make use of the language imputed to me by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] let him rise now and state it. I ask him to do it as a matter of justice. If any of my colleagues ever heard me make such a statement, I want them to rise now and so state to this House. I pause for a reply.

There is no reply. I again ask if any gentleman on this floor ever heard me say the only solution of the labor problem was the shedding of blood, or that I desired to see this problem solved by shedding blood, let him state it. I pause again for a reply. There is none.

But the Saint Louis paper says:

FORAN has been playing a very ugly part ever since he failed to secure the chairmanship of the Labor Committee, while O'NEILL has done all that was possible to avoid difficulty with him.

This statement has been made several times before, and I now submit to my colleagues upon the Committee on Labor whether my conduct there has not been in all respects that of a gentleman. I submit that question to my colleagues on the committee. There has been friction in that committee, but it arose from causes which would exist if I had left the committee or were not upon it. The other gentlemen of that committee, as well as myself, have been subjected to petty tyrannies and little annoyances which could only spring from the uncultured mind of a small man in accidental authority. [Laughter.]

"Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus, and we petty men [of the committee] walk between his huge legs and peep about to find ourselves dishonorable graves." [Renewed laughter.] I can almost hear him exclaim:

Great and high
The world knows only two—that's Rome and I.
My roof receives me not; 'tis air I tread,
And at each step I feel my advanced head
Knock out a star in heaven.

[Laughter.]

It is perhaps owing to some idiosyncrasy of the gentleman. I am willing to give him all the credit possible, and undoubtedly when he made the statement that I had said I wanted these labor troubles settled by the shedding of blood, the weight of this whole Southwestern difficulty pressed so heavily upon him that he could not sleep, and in his mind's eye he saw "fierce fiery warriors fight upon the clouds in ranks and squadrons and right front of war which drizzled blood upon the Capitol." [Great laughter.]

In his fervid imagination "the graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead did squeak and gibber in Saint Louis streets." [Renewed laughter.] I have asked the gentleman if he has his documentary evidence to produce it. It has not been produced. I do not know—it may perhaps be from my training as a lawyer—but I think I ought to have an opportunity to reply to it now, and therefore I again ask that it be produced. Having denied that I ever made use of any such remark as he has attributed to me, and the assertion being made in this newspaper which circulates in the gentleman's district that there is documentary evidence to the contrary of what I have stated, I would like to have that evidence produced. Let us have it now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Suppose you read the balance of that letter from Judge Noah.

Mr. FORAN. I will read it. Judge Noah says:

I have yours of the 13th to-day. I wish you to distinctly understand that at no time and under no circumstances did I ever attribute to you the desire or expressed wish that bloodshed would follow by reason of your remark that the only solution of the labor difficulties was to "let them fight it out."

That is what Judge Noah says I said in committee—"let them fight it out." Perhaps I did say that; but, as I have already said, every gentleman knows the sense in which it was used.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have a letter here from Judge Noah that I will ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] has the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. He desired the evidence to be produced. It is merely as a matter of courtesy to him that I offer to have this letter read now. That is all.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] yields the letter may be read.

Mr. FORAN. I will yield for that purpose, Mr. Speaker, willingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

No. 1420 NEW YORK AVENUE, Washington, April 21, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of this date, in which you state that "prior to the consideration of the arbitration bill, in a conversation with you [me], I understood you to state to me that Mr. FORAN had stated to you that he thought the only manner in which conflicts between labor and capital could be settled was by their fighting it out, and that you replied this presupposed bloodshed, to which response he said nothing," and inquiring "whether this is correct?" I beg to say, that in a desultory conversation with you at Willard's Hotel, concerning the merits of the various arbitration bills pending before the House Labor Committee, I narrated to you, as chairman of that committee, what had taken place when I was given a hearing by the committee on that subject (at which hearing you were absent), and then stated to you that Mr. FORAN had taken the position broadly in committee that no legislation by Congress would be effectual to put an end to or ameliorate labor strikes, and that the only solution of the trouble was to let them fight it out. I also stated to you on that occasion that I replied to Mr. FORAN's view by calling attention to the fact that fighting it out might presuppose violence and bloodshed, and that Mr. FORAN made no reply thereto save to repeat that no legislation could accomplish any good, and that the only way was to let them fight it out. This is what I stated to you on that occasion in narration of what had occurred in the Committee on Labor.

Very truly, yours,

J. J. NOAH.

Hon. J. J. O'NEILL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. FORAN. That is from the first of Noah. I have something from the second of Noah. But first, is this documentary evidence?

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I fail to see that there is any question of privilege in this matter. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] raises the point that this is not a matter of privilege. The Chair thinks that nothing has been disclosed so far beyond a misunderstanding between two gentlemen as to the opinion expressed by one of them.

Mr. HENLEY. I hope it will not be settled in blood. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] is simply making a personal explanation. It is not a matter of privilege under the rules of the House, and the gentleman can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] be permitted to finish his statement.

Mr. BEACH. I object. [Cries of "Oh!" Oh!"]

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FORAN. If one gentleman says of another in this House that he desires to see people killed—murdered—that he desires bloodshed, and all that implies, does not that affect the gentleman to whom the remark is attributed in his representative capacity?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Missouri had stated on the floor of the House that the gentleman from Ohio desired to see people killed or desired to see bloodshed, but the gentleman from Missouri said on the floor, according to the extract which has been read, that there were some gentlemen who in their hearts believed this matter could only be settled or ought to be settled by blood. The Chair, however, fails to see——

Mr. FORAN. If the Chair will read further he will see the gentleman said they had so stated.

The SPEAKER. But even if that be true the Chair fails to see how that affects the rights or reputation of the gentleman from Ohio in his representative capacity. Any charge against the gentleman as a member of the House, for instance, that he had been bribed to give a certain vote or not to give a certain vote, that he had been influenced by any improper motives in giving or not giving a certain vote as a Representative on the floor—any charges of that character affecting a gentleman's reputation and standing as a member of the House are quite different from remarks which merely attribute individual opinions to a gentleman on the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. If a general charge were made on the floor, and afterward in the public prints the member who made that general charge gives it definite shape so as to refer to a particular member, would not that state of the case modify the ruling of the Chair on this subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the rule. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] must bear in mind that there has been no charge made or intimated that the gentleman from Ohio, as a Representative, has taken action on the floor or elsewhere for the purpose of producing bloodshed or to have this matter settled by bloodshed. There has simply been attributed to him an opinion that it could only be settled in that way.

Mr. REAGAN. But a charge having been made on the floor that certain members had expressed a desire that the question be settled by bloodshed, and the member who made that general statement having afterwards, by language outside of the House, given it specific reference to a particular member, does not such a case present a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. That would be merely attributing to the member an expression of opinion or desire, which the Chair thinks would be a very proper subject for a personal explanation for the purpose of disclaiming any such opinion or purpose, but it does not constitute a question of privilege under the rules of the House. Erroneous opinions are very often attributed to members.

Mr. COLLINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COLLINS. If I make the charge now against the gentleman from Ohio, may he rise to a personal explanation and finish his remarks?

The SPEAKER. What is the question of the gentleman from massachusetts?

Mr. COLLINS. Suppose I make the charge now against the gentleman from Ohio, may he rise to a personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that this would seem to be a very proper subject for a personal explanation for the purpose of disclaiming any such opinions or motives as have been attributed; but it is not a question of privilege under the rules of the House.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Ohio to finish his remarks, I make any necessary charge against him in his representative capacity. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Ohio has put in his disclaimer in advance. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. My question of privilege is this: I have been charged by the gentleman from Ohio with an abuse of my position as chairman of that committee in exercising a tyranny over the members of the committee. I am also charged in the public press, the charge being directly traced to the gentleman from Ohio, with having abandoned my position here as a member of Congress and left the city, for the purpose of preventing him from making a certain explanation. That certainly involves my character as a member of this House; and under all the circumstances I am certainly entitled to the privilege of being heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from Ohio has charged the gentleman from Missouri with an abuse of his power or influence as chairman of the committee, it would present a question of privilege.

Mr. FORAN. I have made no such charge.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman has stated here that the grievances in that committee would exist, even if he left it; that they arose from the tyranny of one who, "dressed with a little brief authority," exercised it over those members. Who else than the chairman of a committee has such authority over the members of the committee?

Mr. FORAN. I ask that the words be read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, I ask for fair play. I do not propose to be treated in this sort of way.

The SPEAKER. The language of the gentleman from Ohio will be read, so that the Chair may ascertain what his remarks were.

Mr. FORAN. I have been endeavoring to keep myself within the parliamentary rule, and I think I can do it.

Mr. BRAGG. Will it be in order to settle this vexed question by referring it to the Committee on Labor for arbitration? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to occupy the floor for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to occupy the floor for ten minutes to make a personal explanation. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. After which, I give notice, I shall call for the regular order. That is fair play.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on the Monday following the delivery of the speech of which the gentleman complains he brought this matter up in the committee; and, as he has stated, he asked me if I referred to him. I assured him that I did. A discussion in that committee developed the fact that other members of the committee understood him the same as I did.

Mr. FORAN. I deny that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I refer to Mr. DANIEL, of Virginia.

Mr. FORAN. He will not say so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri (addressing Mr. DANIEL). I understood you to say that you so understood. Is not that so?

Mr. DANIEL. Am I permitted to reply?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Missouri yields for that purpose.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have asked the gentleman to answer the question if he will be kind enough to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say that when this matter was called up——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman from Virginia takes sides——

Mr. DANIEL. I am not taking sides.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That the proceedings in the committee-room are not proper subjects for revelation on the floor of the House or discussion; and, as affecting not only this matter but all other matters of public concern in connection with the legislation of this body, I must object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Missouri to call upon the gentleman from Virginia to disclose any proceedings of the committee, but simply to state what he understood to be the position of the gentleman from Ohio on the point in controversy.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that this matter came up in the committee-room, and in that committee-room a discussion arose on the subject, in which discussion certain matters were developed; and if I have misunderstood him in that respect, I beg pardon for having interrupted him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not in order to disclose upon the floor of the House any discussion or proceedings in the committee-room; but the Chair does not know what statement the gentleman from Virginia is to make, and of course can not rule upon it in the absence of such knowledge.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The point is upon the utterance of the gentleman from Missouri himself, in which I understood him to say that at the meeting of the committee, where this matter was discussed, certain things were developed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This does nct come out of my time, I hope.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to ask as to what was the understanding of gentlemen who were present as to certain personal remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But in the committee, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Not as to what actually transpired in the committee as a part of the public business, but simply to state what he understood was the position of the gentleman from Ohio on a certain question. The Chair does not think that that would be a disclosure of the proceedings of the committee if made to that extent.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, as I have been referred to, I desire simply to make this statement in justice to the gentlemen in question, as well as in justice to myself: this matter was alluded to in my presence and in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], and gentlemen who were present were called on, or rather it was suggested to them, to state what their understanding was of the matter.

I state this: That upon hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio they had made the same impression upon my mind that they seemed to have made upon the gentleman from Missouri; but that on hearing the gentleman from Ohio state what he had said and on my memory being revived as to the question, I remembered that he had said exactly what he then related himself to have said; and it was an impression on my mind, and not the repetition of the gentleman or that he was accurate, as I distinctly remembered in repeating the language that he had used.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. After the meeting of the committee I met the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] on the floor and he again referred to the subject. I said very frankly that I had no desire to let him remain in the position in which he was, and I would do cheerfully all that I could toward placing him in the position he wanted to be in. At his instance I wrote out for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a change in the words which I had used, and gave them to the Official Reporters for insertion. The words were changed by himself and are there in the permanent RECORD. As delivered in the House on April 3, and so reported, they were as follows:

> And when I see men on this floor pretending to represent labor organizations, who stand back and say, "We favor neither compulsory arbitration nor voluntary arbitration," I say they are men who know in their hearts that their true sentiment is that these issues can only be settled by blood.—Daily Record, page 3061.

The reference to "men pretending to represent labor organizations" was understood by the gentleman from Ohio to refer to himself, and therefore, at his suggestion, I struck this out first, and in the permanent RECORD the corrected sentence reads as follows:

> And I see men on this floor who stand back and say "we favor neither compulsory arbitration nor voluntary arbitration;" who say, "these issues can not be aided by law, but may eventually have to be settled by the shedding of blood."—Page 3036 of the permanent RECORD.

Mr. FORAN. I never agreed to any such statement.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why, you put these words in yourself.

Mr. FORAN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And I handed them to the Official Reporters three weeks ago, and they have been in the permanent RECORD ever since. Mr. Pearson, the foreman of the RECORD, appends a certificate, which I will read:

> I have compared the above, and find the same to be true copies from the daily and permanent RECORD.
> AVEN PEARSON,
> Foreman Congressional Record.

Prior to my going away on that little trip to which the gentleman from Ohio so facetiously refers, he got that little clipping from the Cleveland paper—that little old chestnut which he has been carrying around with him ever since, and said that were it not for that he would have been willing to let the whole matter drop; but since the thing had got into the Cleveland papers it placed him in rather an awkward position. He thought he had better rise to a question of privilege. I told him that I would stand by him if he did so, and that we would present again, on the floor of the House, the spectacle of Damon and Pythias, in which, of course, I would be Damon. [Laughter.] I said to him: "I will stand by you and do all I can to get you out of this hole." [Renewed laughter.]

He came to me the day before I left and he told me, "I will get up to-morrow after the reading of the Journal."

Mr. FORAN. Is it not true that the day the bill passed the gentleman came to my desk and said he would correct the impression——

Mr. O'NEILL. The day the bill passed?

Mr. FORAN. Yes.

Mr. O'NEILL. I never spoke to you till the following Monday.

Mr. FORAN. Did you not say you would make the correction, and that you would make it during the debate?

Mr. O'NEILL. I never saw you at that time. On the Wednesday preceding my departure from the city the gentleman again referred to his question of privilege, and I said, "Get up this afternoon; I am under the weather just now, and am going away for a few days. Get this off your stomach; get rid of it."

That evening I attended a labor meeting at the armory and had the pleasure of presenting my distinguished colleague as one of labor's champions. We shook hands cordially. Everything looked contentment, peace, and harmony. I never dreamed he had in his heart the animus which his after conduct showed. On my return last Tuesday I found in the New York World the following:

> The Labor Committee is not surrounded with the peace that should characterize those engaged in the laudable enterprise of adjusting the difficulties between laborers and employers. For some time there has been a feeling not altogether friendly between the chairman of the committee, Mr. O'NEILL, and Mr. FORAN, of Ohio, who aspired to the chairmanship of the committee, and is one of the prominent labor leaders at the West. Mr. FORAN, for some reason, was for the past few days possessed of a desire to call Mr. O'NEILL to account for certain reflections cast upon him in reference to matters having taken place in the committee-room. Mr. FORAN proposes rising to a question of privilege, at which time he says he will tell the House that Mr. O'NEILL, though championing the labor bill, was not its author, and until the evening before it was presented to the House loudly favored the passage of a bill providing for compulsory arbitration. * * * Mr. FORAN thinks Mr. O'NEILL is making himself too prominent at the expense of the committee, and it is his intention to clip his wings. Mr. FORAN alleges that the cause for Mr. O'NEILL's absence from the House, which has continued for some days, is that he is afraid to face the music of an exposure.

As soon as I had read that paper last Tuesday I took it and put it under the gentleman's nose, and told him I understood he was responsible for it, and asked him to get on his legs and make his question of privilege. It has taken him four days to get a derrick large enough to raise him up.

From the time I have been chairman of that committee until now, and even in advance of it, I have not been spared by the gentleman from Ohio. His charge in regard to my deficiency in education and mental acquirements even preceded my appointment; but the gentleman wrote me a personal letter stating that the charges in a Cleveland paper accredited to him were not his sentiments. From the inception of those charges until now I have been fettered and fretted and worried by the gentleman who is so terribly afflicted by a bad case of "sore head." There has not been a measure of merit brought before that committee that has not found in him a ready opponent. As to the arbitration bill, the misfortune was my name was connected with it, and it passed. If it had been a disastrous failure, and there had only been 29 votes in favor of it he would have held me responsible for that piece of framework, charged it on me, and called it "the O'Neill bill."

Mr. FORAN. Did I not state from the outset that I was opposed to all measures for labor arbitration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the Speaker to hold the gavel just one moment. My time has been taken up very much by others. The gentleman from Ohio in the committee sat quietly by, and when I announced it was the unanimous opinion of the committee, after we had passed it, he reserved his right to object, and you know how viciously he fought it in this House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the call of committees for reports be dispensed with, and that gentlemen who have reports to present be recognized for that purpose.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARTIN H. M'CHESNEY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5289) affirming the action of the President of the United States in annulling and revoking the order dismissing Martin H. McChesney from service in the armies of the United States, and honorably discharging said McChesney from said service; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report and amendments, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 5532) for the construction of a macadamized road from the city of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, to the national cemetery near said city; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. TAULBEE, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1292) granting a pension to Nathan Z. Bailey; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 8327) to reduce the number of internal-revenue officers, provide a better and more economical administration of the internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). This bill, in the opinion of the Chair, should be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It does not make any charge upon the Treasury. It takes off a charge.

Mr. DINGLEY. It certainly affects the revenue, and should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the repeal of taxes involves a tax upon the people within the sense of the rule, and therefore thinks it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRISON. That is because the Chair does not know what the bill contains.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has heard the bill read.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES ACROSS NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. BYNUM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 901) granting to the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 6013) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 2 miles north and 2 miles south of the city of Atchison, in the county of Atchison, in the State of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. 1360) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 10 miles below and 5 miles above the city of Kansas City, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 3369) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4569) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected either in the counties of Clay and Jackson, in the State of Missouri, or in the county of Clay or Platte, in said State, and the county of Wyandotte, in the State of Kansas, and to make the same a post-route;

A bill (H. R. 5684) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at the most accessible point between the mouth of the Femme Osage Creek and a point 2 miles above the city of Saint Charles, in the county of Saint Charles, in the State of Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. 5685) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at the most accessible point in Saline City, or within 5 miles above or 5 miles below the same, in the county of Saline, in the State of Missouri.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1868) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further informed the House that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 71) for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DOLPH, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. GRAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats, in the District of Columbia, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. INGALLS, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. VEST as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate receded from its amendments to the bill (H. R. 3351) granting a pension to Mrs. Magdalena Rehkopf.

The message further requested the return to the Senate of the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands.

EUNICE E. CLARK.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 6429) entitled "An act granting a pension to Eunice E. Clark," with Senate amendments, and moved non-concurrence in the Senate amendments, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. NEECE, Mr. PINDAR, and Mr. CONGER as managers on the part of the House at said conference.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.

The Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

SUBTREASURY AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 902) to establish a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is not to oppose this particular bill or any particular bill establishing a subtreasury that I take the floor again to-day, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the general subtreasury system as it has come to exist in this country—a system which takes out of the channels of business and trade the revenues for carrying on the Government and sets up independent machinery for collecting and applying the revenues to Government expenses.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, in that regard, we have scarcely passed beyond the age of barbarism. In other words, we are still applying the same methods that were applied two thousand years ago in Rome, when, under her provincial government, taxes were collected in the provinces, taken to Rome, put in the treasury, and only paid out through government agencies. All other governments in civilized countries have learned to employ the machinery which commerce and the business of the country have established. The business of government is not so different from other business as to require separate agencies of its own.

I referred yesterday to the way the revenues were collected in England, through the Bank of England. I find, on reference to the weekly report of the Bank of England, that there was on deposit to the credit of the government, for the week ending June 27, £4,288,000, and for the next week £4,028,000, while for the week ending February 10 the amount was £4,663,000. This sum varies from one or two millions of pounds up to six or eight millions of pounds; that is to say, from five or six millions of dollars up to forty or fifty millions; seldom, however, reaching the larger sum. When the deposit to the credit of the government falls too low, the chancellor of the exchequer sells exchequer bills, in that way anticipating the revenues.

On the average the amount to the credit of the government does not amount to more than about $20,000,000. In other words, in the collection and expenditure of $450,000,000 by employing the machinery which business employs, which the trade and commerce of the country employ, they only keep a surplus on the average of fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, and that is deposited in the Bank of England, not entirely withdrawn from circulation or taken out of business.

In the bank of France for the week ending April 9 I find deposited to the credit of the general treasury 96,700,000 francs, or about $19,000,000. The average is generally less than that; it sometimes rises above it; sometimes falls below it. So that in the collection and expenditure of $650,000,000 in France by employing the machinery which the civilization of the age has established, which commerce and trade provide, almost no money is withdrawn from general use; but the business of the government is just like any other business; it is performed through the channels that business has established, and is performed therefore much more economically than with us, and without abstracting from circulation a large part of the volume of money, as we do in this country.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman favor a policy of depositing Government funds with banks to be loaned out?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am coming to that. I am arguing not against a central treasury, but against the extension of the subtreasury system to all the cities in the country. By our independent treasury system and the subtreasury extensions over the country and by the adoption of the same policy by the States, we often abstract well-nigh half of the entire volume of the currency, locking it up, for brief periods of course, but long enough to produce great stringency in business operations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have very decided convictions on the question of the right of banks to create money, that is, to issue currency of any kind; but I hope I have no such prejudices against the use of the banking system of this country for doing Government business in the same way that all other kinds of business are done, and I can see no more reason for establishing a subtreasury at Louisville and forty other places for doing the Government business than for a business house in New York, instead of employing established agencies there, going there and establishing a treasury of its own, or any more reason for establishing a subtreasury there for the collection or paying out the money that is there collected and paid out than to refuse to use the railroads in getting there. Banks are institutions as important as railroads or telegraphs, and as necessary to modern commerce; their function is to collect and utilize capital by bringing it together and making it available for the needs of trade. In a hundred ways they facilitate commerce. They serve every kind of business, and I do not know why they should not be made use of by the Government for its business.

Mr. BLAND. The question that I asked the gentleman was whether he was in favor of the policy of depositing Government funds with the banks to be loaned out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did not understand the gentleman. I think we ought to have a general treasury, and perhaps one or two subtreasuries, and in those should be held securely the coin and bullion upon which certificates are issued, and they should be located at points where they could be thoroughly well guarded.

Mr. BLAND. Why not have one in Louisville, then?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no necessity for one there. The more you multiply these subtreasuries the greater the cost of taking care of the money. Again I say we should have a treasury and one or two subtreasuries, and in those should be deposited the trust funds, the coin and the bullion upon which certificates are issued, and the banks should be utilized for the deposit of money or current funds, and a certain per cent. of such deposits can be loaned out by the banks. Why not? It is then made active capital, and if the Government is secure, why not let such surplus be kept in use? This bill, if passed, will do no good in the world to anybody in Louisville. The money might just as well be in the moon as to be locked up there, so far as any good to any citizen of Louisville is concerned. The people of Louisville can not borrow it, or buy it, or use it. I will say to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], in order that he may understand that I am not opposing this bill because it relates to Louisville or on any narrow basis, that I would vote to abolish the subtreasury in Cincinnati and let it be moved down to Louisville.

Mr. WILLIS. We will agree to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And I believe that the bankers and the business people of Cincinnati are intelligent enough to favor such a step if they could be assured that the Government would deposit in the banks the money now kept in the subtreasury so that it might be made of some use to the people by becoming loanable capital.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I thought I was to have had fifteen minutes, and I have not had that time.

Mr. WILLIS. You yielded five minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have yielded nothing from the fifteen minutes I reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that the bill was to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood the arrangement to be that I was to have fifteen minutes. I will take then only a minute or two more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to say that he wants only two minutes more.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I say, if it is not intended by the establishment of these subtreasuries to hold money under lock and key, there is no use whatever in establishing them. On the other hand, if it is designed to cover into these subtreasuries the revenue and hold it there, keeping it out of business channels, then I say they ought not to be established at all, because they will work positive injury to the community and no good to anybody. In this way of managing our revenues we have been imitating bad systems long ago abandoned in other countries. We have been keeping up the practices of the dark ages. At any rate we have not got beyond the practices of the First Frederick or Henry VII.

Mr. BLAND. Does not the gentleman think that, instead of hauling ten millions of silver dollars from New Orleans to Washington and New York, as was recently done, it would have been better to have transferred it to Louisville or Cincinnati, where it could have gone into circulation and been of some benefit to the people.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would not have removed that at all. I would have deposited the money in the banks in New Orleans, where it could be used as wanted. But it would have been no better to move it to Louisville or Cincinnati than to this city. And if it had been moved to Louisville it would not have done one bit of good to anybody in Louisville. Nobody there could have got it from the subtreasury. And let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to see the large surplus now in the Treasury here not required to be held to meet the demand liabilities of the Government paid out on the public debt. Instead of hoarding so much money, let it out where it will do some good.

The underlying cause of the trouble in this country now, the primary cause I say of the troubles not only in this country but throughout the world, is a shrinking volume of money. Industries are strangled, property depreciates, and nothing but money is safe to hold. Let me read a brief extract from the New York Tribune of yesterday:

> Stagnation in trade and activity in investment were the characteristic features of last week. Neither stocks, grain, pork, cotton, oil, or other products are wanted, but bonds that promise a return are eagerly sought.

Under this system of locking up money and contracting the volume of effective money of the country we have reached a point where there is no profit in anything but in hoarded money. Money is the only thing that is increasing in value, that is, in purchasing power; and the more money there is withdrawn from circulation and locked up in the Treasury the worse it will be, and the only result of the extension of the subtreasury system will be to lock up more money and increase the cost of keeping it.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] can now control the time. Under the order of the House this bill was to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] is recognized.

Mr. MCCREARY. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question in regard to this bill, I do not desire to occupy more time in discussing it. Several weeks ago, under the rule of the House, I made a statement of all the facts upon which this bill was based, and sent it to each member of the House, and since then I have, as far as my limited time would permit, gone from member to member to present the facts connected with the matter. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has made an argument against the whole subtreasury system; but that subject is not now before the House. It will be time enough to discuss a law establishing subtreasuries when there is a bill brought in to abolish all of them. I do not believe, however, that this House intends to reverse the well-established policy of the Government, beginning away back in 1846, when an act was first passed creating subtreasuries. When that act was passed establishing the subtreasury system there were five subtreasuries created. Since then there have been some four more added, making nine in all. In the South there is only one subtreasury, which is at New Orleans. The business connections of Louisville stretch toward the South.

The region from which that business is drawn comprises an area of country which is not touched by any one of the existing subtreasuries. It comprises a considerable portion of Arkansas, Northern Texas, the whole of Tennessee, and the southern part of Indiana. The business interests and banking interests of Louisville embrace that territory. We are within a half-day's journey of eleven millions of people, one-fifth of the whole population of the United States. As to the public business transacted at Louisville, the amount of public money deposited there is equal to that in any three of the existing nine subtreasuries. The amount of money that is paid out is $2,000,000. Upon these facts we have gone before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and they have come in here with a unanimous report. I believe this is the only subject that has been before that committee upon which a unanimous report has been made.

And why do they report it? Because of the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint showing that there is not to-day in the United States enough vault room for the business of this Department. That is one reason. Another is the amount of money paid in and paid out at the city of Louisville. Besides, there is the enormous expense the Government has incurred in transporting from one part of the country to another these public moneys, this expense amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, so that last year $10,000,000 were, in violation of law, brought by ships of war from the city of New Orleans to the subtreasury at New York.

We find further from these published reports that there are to-day in the mints of the country—not a proper receptacle, as the Treasurer states—$150,000,000. What further do we find? From the report of the Treasurer, on page 15, we find that persons occupying positions as messengers and laborers are now engaged in handling, counting, and shipping the public money and in doing other clerical labor. This certainly is not a proper condition of things, and it should be remedied when we can do so, as in this case, with but a very small expense. The amount involved in this bill is about $9,500. We are not asking for any public building; there is a building suitable for the purpose. We only desire the machinery for carrying on this subtreasury; and the expense is one-half of what is asked at these other places—Saint Louis, San Francisco, and Baltimore—all of which combined have not as much public business, either in income or outgo, as the city of Louisville.

These are the statements which have been made; and I have endeavored in these remarks to present the matter faithfully to each member of the House. Knowing that there are other matters pressing, I will, unless some other gentleman desires to speak or make an inquiry, demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRISON. I trust that will not be done.

Mr. WILLIS. I was not aware that the gentleman wanted to say anything. Of course I do not press the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The Chair did not understand whether the gentleman from Kentucky moved the previous question or not.

Mr. WILLIS. I was about to move the previous question, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] desires to be heard.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Several of us want to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Kentucky that, in the opinion of the Chair, this bill must be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, which would certainly require that there be debate at least for five minutes on each side upon each section. After such debate has been had the gentleman from Kentucky can move the previous question.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not the remotest desire, if I had the power, to prevent any gentleman from being heard on the bill. When I proposed to call the previous question I was not aware than any further discussion was desired.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, it is probably to no purpose, but I wish to say a word by way of protest against the passage of this bill. I doubt not a subtreasury at every principal town in the country, and especially at the city of Louisville, would be some convenience to somebody. This is a proposition first to make some new offices, and then, of course, to fill them. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] says, and no doubt truthfully, that to begin with $9,500 is the whole additional cost per annum now proposed for this subtreasury. But who supposes that the appropriation now made will not be followed in another year with an additional or increased sum, which will continue to grow? Where is there a subtreasury maintained for the small cost of $9,500 annually? This sum of $9,500 per annum, the gentleman from Louisville assures us, is to be the whole yearly cost of establishing and maintaining a subtreasury at Louisville.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. With $5,000 additional to prepare the necessary rooms.

Mr. MORRISON. No; I understand $9,500 is to be the whole cost for the new officers and the carrying on of this subtreasury at Louisville for one year. This is the beginning of what is to follow.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. After the offices are fitted up, which will cost $5,000.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not assume or say that upon all money, banking, or other financial questions the United States Treasurer or the Treasury Department must be followed and accepted as right without question. The men who go into that Department, however eminent as financiers, go there with preconceived or fixed notions of finance, which they seldom give up. But this matter of taking care of the public money is one about which this officer and this Department ought to be pretty well advised; and while I do not promise to be always controlled by the suggestions of the Treasury Department, I do think that when the officer of that Department says to Congress, as I understand the Treasurer of the United States has said to the Committee on Appropriations, which was believed by him to have charge of this subject, that this subtreasury is not needed and is not necessary for public purposes and that he desired to be heard on the subject before action should be taken on the bill, we ought at least to hear what the officer has to say and ascertain what value should be attached to his suggestions. This much it seems to me is necessary to our considerate action.

Now a few words to our friends on this side of the House. If I know how we came here, it was partly because we protested that our predecessors, when in control of the Government, kept more men in office and the public employ, had more officers, laid more taxes, collected and spent more money, than was necessary for public uses and purposes.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is it.

Mr. MORRISON. It was statements like these and belief in them that filled many seats with their present occupants. But for the belief and expectation in the public mind that we intended to pursue a different policy from our predecessors some of these seats would be filled by gentlemen of the opposite political party. In this Congress there have been more offices made than have been dispensed with or abolished, and I want to call the attention of gentlemen around me to the fact. For one I propose to stop right here; in fact, I never began. To me it seems more fitting that we on this side of the House should be looking for officers whose services can be dispensed with than hunting or creating places to put in new ones.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the fiscal policy of this Government for many years has combined the subtreasury and the depository system, and we have had neither exclusively. We have to-day, or had at the close of the last fiscal year, nine subtreasuries and one hundred and thirty-two national-bank depositories, in addition to the various mints.

It will be seen by the report of the Treasurer of the United States that he thinks we have gone as far as we ought to go in the extension of subtreasuries, and we should rather limit than extend that system.

On page 506 of the Report on the Finances for this session I find he states the following:

> One hundred and thirty-two national banks acted as depositories during the year, receiving the moneys from collecting officers of the Government, thus saving the risk and expense of transportation to Treasury offices, and disbursing the same on drafts of the Treasurer. A more extended use of the banks as depositories would result in a large saving to the Government, and very much lessen the chances of loss from peculation and frauds in the conduct of the operations of the Treasury, as the proper margin of security in United States bonds is a matter of constant supervision by the Treasurer.

It seems, therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department agrees with what has been already so well stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], that we have already sufficient subtreasuries, and that they should be contracted rather than increased.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have only a moment, and of course can not yield. I understand in the nine subtreasuries for the last year the great body of deposits was in the subtreasury at New York, amounting to $176,000,000. There were at San Francisco eighty-five and a quarter millions; at Washington, twenty-two and three-quarter millions; at Philadelphia, twenty-eight and a quarter millions; at Boston, twenty-two and three-quarter millions; at Saint Louis, twenty-two and a quarter millions; at New Orleans, sixteen millions; at Chicago, sixteen and a quarter millions; at Baltimore, fourteen millions; and at Cincinnati, seven and a quarter millions.

Now, in view of these facts it certainly seems to me wise on the part of the Government that it should not further extend these subtreasuries, but rather extend the policy of depositories, because there is nothing in a subtreasury in any city which can confer additional advantages on that city beyond what a depository will confer, except the single fact it has the name of a subtreasury city, and that there will be added to it an official list of new officers drawing about $10,000 of annual salaries.

Mr. WILLIS. Can any one deposit in any one of these depositories silver and receive a certificate for it?

Mr. DINGLEY. If there is any necessity for extending in that direction it can be accomplished as well without multiplying subtreasuries as it can by multiplying them.

And it seems to me in view of all these circumstances to be unwise for us to increase the expenses of the Government by multiplying officials, especially when it is proposed to put a subtreasury so near one already existing as Louisville is to Cincinnati.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DINGLEY. My time is up.

Mr. WILLIS. Louisville covers an entirely different area.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], it was supposed this measure was pending before another committee of the House, and for that reason, I presume, the Treasurer of the United States, the head of this subtreasury system, sent to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the following communication, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, April 20, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to call your attention to a bill (H. R. No. 902) introduced by Mr. WILLIS, providing for the establishment of a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky., to which I am opposed, for the reason that no such office is needed at that point, and upon which subject I should like to be heard before final action by the House.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer of the United States.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WILLIS. Will my friend permit me to ask if any committee of this House called for that information?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, that brings me to my feet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. That letter came to me and I immediately handed it over to the gentleman from Kentucky in charge of this bill. No doubt Mr. Jordan, the Treasurer of the United States, supposed the bill was in the Committee on Appropriations, when it was not, and I gave it the proper direction.

Mr. WILLIS. I only wanted to know if any committee ever asked his opinion upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not yield further, but I should like to have a little more information upon this point. I should be glad to know, upon the state of facts before us, whether the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had occasion to consider the views of the Treasurer of the United States?

Mr. BLAND. I am aware of one fact that has developed here in this House, that is that the Treasury Department——

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLAND. Well, you asked for information and I wanted to give it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I asked whether or not the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had occasion to consider the views of the Treasurer of the United States upon this question.

Mr. BLAND. The Treasurer of the United States may have favored the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with his views; but it was developed on the floor of this House that the national banking interests were opposed to subtreasuries and favored the depreciation of silver; and in view of the fact that the Treasury Department had been operating with them, we did not feel that we were bound by any recommendation from that Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. And so it appears the committee did not ascertain the views of the Treasurer of the United States. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the two subtreasuries at Cincinnati and Chicago were organized as late as 1873, and that at Saint Louis at a late period; so that now we have in the East subtreasuries at Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York; we have in the Northwest subtreasuries at Cincinnati, Chicago, and Saint Louis; one at New Orleans in the Southwest, and one at San Francisco in the West. These are the nine subtreasuries of the United States, and the cost to the Government is a very considerable sum and the tendency to increase the expenditure is seen in every year's estimates. Each of them involves a large number of officers with large salaries. We have now more than the public service requires.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. What is the cost to the Government of these subtreasuries?

Mr. HOLMAN. The lowest is that at Cincinnati—$15,960; and the highest is $163,000, at New York. The views of the Treasurer of the United States on this subject ought to be conclusive. I am opposed for one to this increase of subtreasuries as proposed by this bill. The proposed subtreasury at Louisville is not required by any public interest. There is no justification of this increase of public expenditure. There is no excuse for this increase in the offices, and I earnestly trust the House will not permit such an increase to be made.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. My point of order is that it is not in order at this time to call the previous question upon this bill. The debate under the five-minute rule has not yet taken place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that it is not in order to call the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. It has not yet been read for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read from page 346 of the Digest a ruling by Speaker CARLISLE on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a bill or resolution is under consideration "in the House as in the Committee of the Whole" under what is known as "the five-minute rule," motions to lay on the table, for the previous question, to reconsider, to postpone, &c., are in order, as is also the demand for the yeas and nays. In other words, such an order merely takes the bill out of the Committee of the Whole, and limits debate thereon to five-minute speeches.

Mr. HISCOCK. The five minutes' debate for the purpose of offering amendments to the bill has not yet commenced, and the bill has not yet been considered under the five-minute rule; therefore the previous question can not be demanded.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think the actual ruling at that time was upon an amendment, or upon some particular section of the bill. The idea I have about it, and the manner in which the subject was brought up, is that we were proceeding to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole; and the only advantage of having it in the House is that at certain times the previous question may be demanded upon particular clauses, amendments, paragraphs, or sections as they come up. For instance, a section of the bill is read; it is then debated, and the previous question may be demanded upon that section; but it can not be demanded upon the whole bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to know what is the purpose of considering a bill under the five-minute rule for debate and amendments if the previous question can shut off the whole?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think I am correct in my recollection of the ruling in question.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, there has been no amendment offered, and therefore there is no amendment to vote upon. As I understand the rule adopted by this House, when a bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and the motion is made and carried to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from its further consideration and consider such bill in the House under the five-minute rule, that it is to be debated under the five-minute rule as if in committee is not strictly correct, because a motion for the previous question, or a motion to lay the subject upon the table, as has just been read, is unquestionably in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has this bill been read yet for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then we are entitled to have it read for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair, if there had been no previous ruling on this subject, would be inclined to sustain the point of order. But the Chair finds in the Digest the ruling of the Speaker of the House which the Clerk has just read. It is to the effect that the consideration of bills in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule, does not in any way limit the operation of the previous question. The previous question may be ordered at any time after the five-minute debate has begun upon the bill. So the Speaker has held and it has been the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has it been so held as that the previous question may be ordered upon any part of a bill that has not been read for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the ruling of the Speaker has gone to the extent that the previous question can be ordered after there has been a five-minute debate upon the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has the Chair examined the original decision upon this point, or is he proceeding on what appears in the Digest?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is the decision as given in the Digest. The Chair will ask the Clerk again to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a bill or resolution is under consideration "in the House as in the Committee of the Whole" under what is known as the "five-minute rule," motions to lay on the table, for the previous question, to reconsider, to postpone, &c., are in order, as is also the demand for the yeas and nays. In other words, such an order merely takes the bill out of the Committee of the Whole and limits debate thereon to five-minute speeches.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the previous question can not be ordered on what has not been read. It can only be ordered on what has been considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill was read in the House on yesterday, and has been considered under the five-minute rule to-day.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the bill has not been read for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is in order at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois rises to make a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I call the attention of the Chair to this fact, that the bill has been considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that it can not be disposed of finally as long as any member wants to offer an amendment till that is disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be the rule in the Committee of the Whole House; but in the House as in Committee of the Whole the previous question can be ordered. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire if the motion for the previous question is voted down would not the bill then be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would. The question is on ordering the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 58, noes 66.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. WILLIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is a motion to lay the bill on the table in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILLIS. I had the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Kentucky call for tellers?

Mr. WILLIS. If the House will indulge me for a quarter of a minute I desire to make a very brief statement. I have no desire to cut off debate or amendments. I trust the House knows me well enough to believe that I have not. I appeal to the House, and to its sense of fairness, to allow me to make a motion to postpone the consideration of this bill to a future day.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the bill be recommitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must entertain the motion of the gentleman from Indiana as first in order, to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am perfectly willing to substitute the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the motion to lay on the table and moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope that motion will be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to postpone has preference. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to postpone the consideration of this measure—until when?

Mr. WILLIS. The 15th of May. I hope there will be no opposition to that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire if this bill should be postponed till the 15th of May what preference would it have over other business on that day? It is fair we should know that before we vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that at that time it would occupy the same position as it does now.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand, then, that it goes into the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would take its place in the order of unfinished business at that day, as a special order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suppose the postponement of the bill to a particular day would have the same effect as a special order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be made a special order in the order of unfinished business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand it is made a special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that postponing a proposition to a day certain makes it a special order for that day.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KELLEY. Would it exclude a revenue bill? For I understand one has been substantially fixed for consideration on that day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would prefer that the Speaker occupying the chair at the time when the bill shall be again called up shall rule on any question that may arise as to its status.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WILLIS, there were—ayes 115, noes 15.

Mr. DUNHAM. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for the yeas and nays for the purpose of letting the House carry out its will. Unless the vote is taken by yeas and nays the House can not carry out its will.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 56 members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on postponing the further consideration of this bill to the 15th of May.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 213, nays 20, not voting 90; as follows:

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, with Mr. MARKHAM.
Mr. LOVERING with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of the bill has expired.

PRINTING FOR SELECT COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution for present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the select committee on existing labor troubles be printed, and that 100 extra copies thereof be printed for the use of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARIA HOLLANDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 7, 1886.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill indicated in the message of the Senate will be returned as requested.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter my dissent from a report made from the Judiciary Committee upon the adulteration of food.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman may file his views and have them printed with the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the point of order made last evening by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from the same State [Mr. EVERHART]. The Chair indicated yesterday his disposition to overrule the point of order and to submit this amendment to a vote of the committee. On reflection, the Chair is satisfied that he was then wrong, and now hastens to correct his error. The situation is just this: The original paragraph in the bill has been stricken out and new matter inserted. The amendment against which the point of order is raised proposes to strike out this new matter. To do this would be equivalent to a reconsideration of the action by which the Committee of the Whole inserted this matter. This can not be done. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. EVERHART. Is it in order to move to lay that proposition on the table?

The CHAIRMAN. In Committee of the Whole there is no such motion as a motion to lay on the table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of the Muskingum River, Ohio, between Zanesville and the mouth of the river, and for operating the same, $20,000. And the United States hereby accepts from the State of Ohio the said Muskingum River improvement, and all the locks, dams, and their appurtenances, and the canals belonging to said improvement, and all the franchises and property of every kind, and rights in said river, and its improvements now owned, held, and enjoyed by the State of Ohio, subject to the conditions in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio passed and taken effect on the 2d day of May, 1885, including all water leases and rights to use water under and by virtue of any lease of water now running and in force between the State of Ohio and all persons using said water, hereby intending to transfer to the United States such rights in said leases and contracts as are now owned, held, or reserved by the State of Ohio; but not to affect any right to the use of the water of said river now owned and held by the lessees of any water right under any lease or contract with the State of Ohio. And the United States hereby assumes control of said river subject to the paramount interest of navigation. The provisions of this act, so far as they relate to the Muskingum River, shall not take effect, nor shall the money hereby appropriated be available, until the State of Ohio, acting by its duly authorized agent, turns over to the United States all property ceded by the act of the General Assembly aforesaid, and all personal property belonging to the improvement aforesaid, and used in its care and improvement, and any balance of money appropriated by said State for the improvement of said river and which is not expended on the 15th day of July, 1886.

Mr. REAGAN. I observe that this paragraph proposes that the United States accept from the State of Ohio this work, subject to the conditions of an act of the General Assembly of that State. I would like to know what the provisions of that act are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The act of the Legislature of Ohio simply cedes to the United States all the right, title, and interest of the State in the improvement of the Muskingum River.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the meaning of the reservation of water rights and privileges? Does it mean that there are mills or other private establishments to be supplied with water-power by this expenditure on the part of the General Government?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Under the system of improvement of the Muskingum River and all the canals in the State—and I may as well say the Muskingum River improvement is part of the old canal system of the State—under that system the State has always by written leases leased to mill-owners and manufacturing establishments along the line of the stream the right to use the surplus water, the water not necessary for navigation. Some of those leases do not expire for two or three years. Not more than one or two of them extend beyond 1890. The provision of this river and harbor bill is that the rights acquired under those leases, whatever they may be, shall not be disturbed until the expiration of the term for which the leases are to run. I ought to say in this connection that the supreme court of our State in two or three cases, notably in the case of The Manhattan branch of the Ohio Canal vs. The City of Toledo, has decided that the lessee of the water privilege has no right which he can enforce against the State or anybody else; that he only holds his privilege as a matter of grace, his rights being subordinated to the right of navigation in the canal.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the decision to which the gentleman refers, if we now pass an act of Congress accepting and assuming control of these works, subject to the rights of lessees of water privileges, it will not be within the power of any court to take away those privileges.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will allow me to say that the net income to the State from these leases is something over $4,000 a year; and by the terms of this act the proceeds of those leases are transferred to the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, we have spent nearly $2,000,000 in making locks and dams on the Fox River, Wisconsin, to supply water-power for mills and manufacturing establishments. I take it that the provision now before us proposes not only that the Government enter upon slackwater navigation at this point, but that it furnish water-power for private individuals or corporations—the same thing which has been done at Saint Anthony Falls and upon the Fox River. I have protested when a preceding provision of this bill was under consideration against the increase of appropriations for slackwater navigation; and I wish to protest again.

In the case of the Monongahela River we had adopted an amendment which would have taken the sting out of the scheme of the Monongahela Navigation Company; but after this had been done an amendment was offered striking out all that and inserting another provision to the effect that this company should not levy tolls upon any commerce originating above its works. Everybody must know that this proviso meant simply nothing, but left in the bill a clean appropriation of $120,000 for that work, because a company incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania and authorized by the laws of that State to charge tolls on the commerce of that river will pay no more attention to a proviso of that kind than if it had never been inserted. I was therefore amazed that the House sat still and adopted an amendment like that striking out a substantial proposition which had been before agreed to.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is worth while to spend time in resisting efforts which will inevitably lead to the destruction of all possibility of ever passing river and harbor bills. If we are to extend provisions of this kind to all the slackwater navigation—commencing with the Columbia River, and taking in the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, the Des Moines Rapids Canal, the Tennessee River Canal, the Louisville and Portland Canal, the Kentucky River Slack-Water Navigation, the Great Kanawha Slack-Water Navigation, on the three rivers, about which provisions have already been inserted in this bill, one in the State of Pennsylvania, two in Kentucky—where it is proposed the Government shall purchase works already in existence——

Mr. KING obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. REAGAN. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his courtesy. I will not transgress upon the attention of the House any longer than necessary.

The money that will be required for these canals and this slackwater navigation would do a great deal toward deepening and removing obstructions in the navigable rivers of the country, estimated, I believe, to be about 28,000 miles of navigable water. It would do a great deal toward improving the great lakes and the other navigable lakes of the country. It would do a great deal toward deepening and removing obstructions in the inlets to the harbors of the country so as to secure convenience, cheapness, and ease to navigation. But just so surely as we go on loading the river and harbor bill with provisions for the purchase of expensive canals and systems of slackwater navigation we shall break down the river and harbor bill and arrest all improvements in this line.

It is for this purpose, and because I do not think the Government ought to take hold of private works and works of private corporations—take them off their hands or off the hands of the State, simply to be held by the Federal Government.

Some of these works were necessary. I believe the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was a necessity. I think the Des Moines Canal was a necessity. I think the Louisville and the Tennessee River Canals were necessary. The others I would classify as luxuries of the most expensive sort. It seems to me, while improving navigation to increase business in a particular locality, it may be calculated to do a great deal to injure the general work on rivers and harbors in the way of facilitating and cheapening the transportation of the commerce of the country. To facilitate and cheapen that transportation is the great work, and nothing should be allowed to interfere with it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a point of order in reference to so much of the pending paragraph as is included in the words in lines 860–861:

And the canals belonging to said improvement, &c.

The point I make is that this is a river and harbor appropriation bill, and it has been decided that canals are no part of such improvements. Here is a proposition looking to the acquisition of a canal, with all its appurtenances, locks, and dams. Under the distinction made in the decision of the Chair yesterday, I hold this portion of the pending paragraph is subject to the point of order and must be ruled out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say in reply to the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa that the Oswego River is not a canal. The system of slackwater navigation consists in the construction of a short canal of about one-fifth of a mile in length as a part and necessary adjunct of the navigation of a river. This work was begun in 1831.

The system then was to put a dam into the river and penetrate it with a lock, so as to land the boat in a slackwater a short distance above the dam. It is no more a canal than is the central stone work of any lock on the dam. That is all there is about it.

About the canals on this river—and I wish to speak of them as they deserve, and will do so hereafter—changes have been made until they are reduced to four or five little short canals, one little over a mile and the others most of them only one-fifth of a mile in length, used simply for the purpose of getting above the dam.

Mr. WILLIS. I submit to the Chair that the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa came too late. This paragraph was under discussion and had been discussed for some time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order against a portion of the pending paragraph that in providing for canals it provides for something which has nothing at all to do with the improvement of rivers and harbors. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the further point that the gentleman's point of order came too late; that the paragraph had been under consideration before the gentleman from Iowa rose from his seat to raise the point of order. The Chair decides the point of order came too late, as the paragraph had been under consideration for some time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will move then to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I submit I rose to make the point of order on the pending paragraph at the very first moment it was possible for me to do so. I tried to get the attention of the Chair, but others were recognized, and as soon as I could get the attention of the Chair I made the point of order against the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, that the question was being discussed before the gentleman from Iowa sought the attention of the Chair or before the Chair observed him. The gentleman from Texas had occupied the floor for five minutes, and his time having expired and the hammer having fallen, the floor was taken by another and the time yielded to the gentleman from Texas to conclude his speech. It was not until the gentleman from Texas had concluded his speech that the gentleman from Iowa raised the point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has been recognized, and is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A canal has no place here, and might be dropped out without any loss whatever.

Mr. HEPBURN. What has become of my point of order as to that portion of the paragraph relating to canals not being in order to a river and harbor appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been decided to have been made too late. The Chair is aware of the fact that a distinction has been made as between canals proper and natural water ways. The point of order has been decided to have been made too late, and the floor has been assigned to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the General Government has undertaken to improve all the tributaries of the Ohio River on the Kentucky and West Virginia side, as well as certain of the tributaries on the western side. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was chairman of the committee having charge of the improvements of rivers and harbors, I remember bills were brought in for the improvement of tributaries of the Ohio even where dams had been constructed by private parties. The General Government has expended a large amount of money on the Big Kanawha, and is spending money on the Little Kanawha and upon most of the other tributaries of the Ohio River. The Muskingum River is one of the largest if not the largest tributary of the Ohio from the west, and the only reason why the General Government has not taken control of that river and made appropriations for it is that many years ago, when a different system prevailed, the State of Ohio undertook to improve this river, and did improve it.

Under the earlier decisions of the court a river, if wholly within a State, although a tributary to an interstate water way, was left to the care of the State; but under later decisions, which go so far as to establish the right of the General Government to remove even the dams and locks which may have been placed upon a river by a State, things have changed. There is no longer any question as to the right of the Government in such cases to take possession and improve such navigable tributaries, but it is the only power that can. The General Government, notwithstanding the work the State has done, may at any time take possession of the Muskingum River, and may prevent the building of bridges across it, and may, if it sees fit, without asking leave, remove from it all dams, locks, or other obstructions placed there by the State.

The decisions of the courts go to this extent; that is, the jurisdiction of the General Government is not only paramount but exclusive whenever it chooses to assert it. The Muskingum is a navigable tributary of the Ohio, and is therefore a part of an interstate system of navigable waters; and if one part of such a system is taken in charge by the General Government, why not the whole? There is a hesitancy in every State since the General Government has entered upon the system of improvements, under the later decisions of the courts, to appropriate money for any works that are interstate; and if the rivers of one State are to be provided for out of the common Treasury, why should not all be?

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not a proposition to obtain control by purchase or by condemnation. It is a proposition to take possession without cost of a river already improved and to appropriate a small sum for further improvement. A large amount of money has been expended by the State on this river for its improvement, all of which passes to the General Government without cost. There is no other way, I say, under the decisions I have referred to, to maintain such works as these and continue them as parts of a general system of water ways but to have the General Government assume the control which the Supreme Court of the United States has said they may.

All we ask is that this river be put upon the same basis as the other tributaries of the Ohio. No money is to be paid to the State; there is no purchase of the works to be negotiated, but a very valuable property is ceded to the General Government in order that the system of the Ohio and its great tributaries may be made complete and open to all alike. The Government could, in my opinion, now stop the collection of all tolls on this river. I go so far as to say under the decision of the court that the collection of tolls by State authority might be prohibited on the commerce of this river on the ground that tolls are an obstruction to interstate commerce. That is the situation; and for this reason it is proposed to put this tributary upon the same footing with all the other great tributaries of the Ohio River by putting it under the control of the General Government.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I renew it. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors inform us what improvements there are now on this Muskingum River that it proposes to appropriate this $20,000 for. My understanding is that the only work now being prosecuted is the completion of the ice-harbor, and that there is no other work being done. There is no other reference to the Muskingum River in the reports of the engineers. If there is I am unable to find it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that there are full and elaborate reports from the engineers of the Government of the details of the work proposed to be done, with maps and plans. This was offered some time ago and is now before the House. It bears date January 22, 1886.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then it was submitted after the reports of the engineers?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; it is not in the last year's report.

Mr. HEPBURN. For all we find in the reports is that the engineers are now engaged in building an ice-harbor, upon which there has already been expended $194,000, and that it is proposed to expend $95,000 more in the completion of that harbor.

Now we find here a proposition to appropriate $20,000 in this paragraph for the improvement of the Muskingum River and then this other extraordinary provision looking to the acquisition of the works by the General Government. It seems to me as if the appropriation was gratuitously made by the committee in order to have something upon which they could hang that other proposition to acquire the work. If that is not so I would be glad if the chairman would inform us what the facts are.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who can explain the matter very fully.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the Muskingum River improvement, now navigable by steamboats, is 65 miles long, extending from Marietta, on the Ohio River, to Zanesville. Heretofore on that river the State of Ohio has expended $1,600,000 for the construction of its locks and dams. The work, as I have said, was begun in 1836 and completed in 1841. The State of Ohio has appropriated somewhere from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars a year to keep these locks and dams in repair. It is like any other slack-water navigation, and does not keep itself in repair. It is like any other river and harbor of the country which requires to have appropriations of money from year to year, as occasion may require, to keep it up. The general appropriation of the Ohio Legislature, which is probably the law to-day, provides that $10,000 be expended for the improvement of this river this year, and the bill of the committee provides that that money, or so much as may not have been expended on the 15th of July coming, shall be transferred with the personal property to the Government, and then the control of the river shall pass to the control of the United States, and shall henceforth become and remain a part of the public works of the Government.

The personal property consists of boats and the plant, as we call it, to keep a slack-water navigation of 65 miles in repair, and the $20,000 to be appropriated by this bill is to be appropriated to meet the requirements of the estimates made by the engineers for the repairs and improvements of the locks and dams. I have said it cost $1,600,000. The State of Ohio has expended $704,571.26 upon the work in addition to the original cost, and has received from it $670,975.88. So that during the whole time from 1838, when the first tolls were collected, down to this time the net expense to the State of Ohio above receipts has been only $33,585.38. The water-rents amount to about $4,000 a year, and by the terms of this bill they are transferred to the General Government. But care has been taken in the act that no injustice shall be done to the lessees, who hold their leases subject to the paramount interest of navigation.

Now I want to speak a word or two about the business of that river. It is a beautiful river, and is the only tributary of the Ohio River lying in Ohio for which the Government has been asked to make any expenditure of money. I was met the other day by the question, and I will answer it now, why does the State of Ohio propose to concede this work to the General Government? I will tell you. This slack-water navigation is part of a system of canals running from Cincinnati to Toledo, from Portsmouth to Columbus, from Columbus down the Hocking Valley, and from Columbus to Cleveland, by way of Coshocton, and from Zanesville to Marietta by this river. It is all one system and is called the public works of Ohio. They were leased from 1869 to 1878 to the "lessees of the public works;" and my statement of the receipts and expenditures does not cover that time. This river, I understand, was very profitable to the lessees.

Many canals of Ohio are becoming unprofitable. The Muskingum improvement is one of the fairly profitable works of the State, and the canal from Cincinnati to Toledo is another; one on one side of the State, substantially, and the other on the other side of the State. Some portions of canals have been abandoned already by acts of the General Assembly, and a strong party in the State favors an entire abandonment of the profitless portions of the canals. So it has been deemed wise to lop off from the general canal system of the State this valuable improvement and ask the Government to take it without additional cost and keep it for the general purposes of navigation.

These 65 miles are traversed every day by steamboats. One leaves Zanesville every morning going through the great county of Muskingum, the county of Morgan, and then the county of Washington, the large and productive county represented by General WARNER in this House, with its over 43,000 inhabitants, and so on to Marietta. And a boat leaving Marietta in the morning of each day goes to Zanesville, so that the river is traversed twice a day from one end to the other, besides the small boats running from Zanesville to McConnelsville a round trip daily, and from Beverly to Marietta, a round trip also each day.

This navigation furnished all the means of public travel between Marietta and Zanesville, and the United States sends its mails over the whole route daily.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The business of that river is very profitable. I have a statement here from the report of the engineer showing the amount of business which is done. It is very large. I will only stop to read a few items of the shipments for one single year. It embraces every commodity produced in that magnificent valley. Among the other items, that of general merchandise amounted to 1,025,000 pounds, while pig-iron amounted to 333,000 tons, lumber 463,000 feet, and timber 98,000. Every commodity that that valley produces is carried upon that slack-water navigation.

I here add a statement of the business showing the average annual shipments since 1878, when the property came back to the control of the State.

And this commerce may be greatly increased. I quote from the report of the engineer:

INCREASE OF COMMERCE.

In regard to the question as to the increased amount of commerce that would be dependent upon this river for transportation were the General Government to take possession of it and make such repairs and improvements as are practicable for its better navigation, I would say that there could undoubtedly be developed a very large increase of business. From information of the most reliable character I am able to state that there are important deposits of coal, salt, natural gas, oil, and cement along and accessible to the river. It also flows through a rich valley furnishing a large amount of produce.

This work is not an experiment, and I take pleasure in presenting the report of the engineer of the United States showing the value and quality of the river:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Cincinnati, Ohio, January 9, 1886.

GENERAL: The river and harbor act approved July 5, 1884, provides, among other surveys, for one of Muskingum River. This survey having been assigned to me, I have the honor to submit the following report:

The act itself contains no instructions as to the object to be attained by the survey, except that the general preface requires "estimates of costs of improvements proper to be made." To understand the present status of the river in question, a brief history is necessary.

The Muskingum is the largest and most important river lying wholly within the State of Ohio, and it is the only one that is navigable for any considerable distance. It drains the larger portion of the eastern half of the State, its headwaters extending to within 25 miles of Lake Erie, where they interlock with those of the Cuyahoga. A line drawn due south from Cleveland would very nearly bisect the basin of the Muskingum, but it would pass about 20 miles west of Marietta, at which point the Muskingum empties into the Ohio. The extreme length of the river is 225 miles, and its basin contains an area of 6,250 square miles.

When the State of Ohio, about fifty years ago and prior to the era of railroads, began to create a system of water ways for the development of its internal commerce, it was thought best to make the Muskingum River a part of the system by building locks and dams from its mouth to Dresden, creating 91 miles of slack-water. At Dresden a junction was made with the "Ohio" Canal, which runs from Lake Erie, at Cleveland, to the Ohio River, at Portsmouth, the mouth of the Scioto. It thus results that this line of water transportation connects with the Ohio River both at Marietta and at Portsmouth, points that by river are 183 miles apart.

The Muskingum slack-water was begun in 1837 and completed in 1841, by the construction of twelve locks, eleven dams, and five short lengths of canals. The locks are 180 feet long between hollow quoins, and they are built with a chamber width of 36 feet, but, owing to the yielding of the walls, the present greatest available width is 34 feet; the greatest available length for boats is 158½ feet. Each dam has one lock connected with it, except at Zanesville, where there is a flight of two locks. At six of these dams the lock adjoins the dam, and the passage from one pool to another is immediate. At the other dams the passage is by a lateral canal, and these canals vary in length from 1⅛ miles to two-sevenths of a mile. Experience has shown that these canals are a serious detriment to navigation, as the difficulty of getting rid of the sediment that accumulates in them has given rise to the practice of banking the spoil, thus reducing the water way to such a degree that boats can not pass each other in the canals, and even the passage of one boat is tedious and difficult. Were the navigation of the Muskingum more active these canals would long since have been abolished as an intolerable nuisance.

The survey of the Muskingum River was made by Mr. John B. Gregory, late chief engineer of the board of public works, assisted by Mr. T. D. Paul, assistant engineer. From Mr. Gregory's report, which is hereto attached, it will be seen that the works are not in very good order, that the upper lock and dam at Symme's Creek has been abandoned, and that he estimates that $114,000 will be required to put the improvement in good order between Zanesville and Marietta, without taking into account the repair of the Symme's Creek dam.

My own experience shows that nothing is more uncertain than estimates on hydraulic work, that hidden and unknown damages are constantly appearing whenever repairs are begun, and that the safest plan is to double all detailed estimates in order to provide for the unforeseen. I therefore think it advisable to increase Mr. Gregory's estimate to $200,000.

At the last session of the Ohio Legislature an act was passed offering the Muskingum River and its appurtenances to the United States, and a copy of this act is hereto annexed. In view of this offer of the State it seems to be my duty to submit an estimate of the probable cost to the United States of accepting this offer. The items of this cost will consist of the repairs just named, of the annual expenditure for salaries of resident engineer and lock-keepers, of the current repairs of the works, and of the expenditure for dredging.

The following table, which has been compiled from the latest annual reports of the board of public works of the State of Ohio, shows the receipts and expenditures on the Muskingum River during the last three years.

Financial statement of Muskingum River improvement.

Year ending November 15—	Receipts.			Special appropriation.	Disbursements.	Annual salaries.
	Tolls, &c.	Rents.	Total.			Superintendent.	Collectors.	Lock-tenders.	Total.
1882	$13,655 22	$4,004 34	$17,659 56	.....	$23,780 27	$1,200	$990	$2,592	$4,692
1883	13,221 29	3,369 40	16,590 69	.....	44,027 72	1,200	900	2,592	4,692
1884	9,550 85	4,537 99	14,088 84	$10,000	25,215 53	1,200	900	2,304	4,404
Total	36,427 36	11,911 73	48,339 09	.....	93,023 52	.....	.....	.....	13,788
Average per year	12,142 45	3,970 58	16,113 03	.....	31,007 84	.....	.....	.....	4,596

It will be seen from the above that, during the last three years, the expenditures on the Muskingum River improvement have averaged $31,007, while the receipts have averaged $16,113, or about one-half the expenditures. Were the United States to take charge of this improvement the annual revenue from tolls would disappear, and the only revenue that would remain would be that from rents, of which the annual average is about $4,000.

The estimate of $200,000 herein submitted is for repairs that are immediately demanded, in order to bring the works into good condition. After these repairs are made it will still be necessary to provide for the current renewals of lock-gates and other perishable structures, and for annual repairs due to future floods and accidents, which are inseparable from this class of works. It is impossible to make a precise estimate on matters which are so dependent upon unknown contingencies, but, considering the age and condition of the works, it seems not unreasonable to assume that the average cost of repairs during the last three years will continue for many years to come. As the only expenditures are for repairs and salaries, it is evident that by subtracting the latter from the former we shall get the cost of repairs alone. This subtraction gives $26,412, which for convenience may be called $25,000.

The salaries paid by the State are very small, much smaller than are paid by the United States for similar services on other rivers, and it is evident that if the Government were to take control of the Muskingum River the salaries of its employés on this river would have to be equalized with those of employés in similar positions on other rivers. The State now pays the superintendent $1,200 per year, and the lock-tenders get from $20 to $25 per month. For such services the Government would undoubtedly pay $50 per month to lock-keepers, and $2,500 per year to the superintendent. I do not see how competent men can be obtained for less. This would raise the salary account to $8,500 per year, but the increase seems to be justified, and would probably result in securing the services of a better class of men and in a better maintenance of the works themselves. As the first cost of the Muskingum slack water was about $1,500,000, at a time when wages and material were low, an annual expenditure of $8,500 for operating and caring for this property does not seem unreasonable.

As long as the present lateral canals remain an annual charge for dredging must be incurred, and as there is no dredge-boat connected with this river one must be built and operated. The serious problem is how to get rid of the spoil, and for that reason I think that "ladder" or "pump" dredges are the only types which are adapted to this particular work. The cost of a small dredge of either kind would be about $5,000, and the annual cost of operating it would be about $2,500. After all of the lateral canals were once cleaned out and restored to their original width the services of a dredge would only be occasionally needed, but for several years her services would be continuous.

It is my decided opinion that steps should be taken at an early day to abolish all lateral canals, as they are a constant source of expense and of delay; and it can not be claimed that they are a necessity, as there are no lateral canals on the Monongahela, Little Kanawha, Great Kanawha, Kentucky, Green, Illinois, nor in fact on any American river of which I have any knowledge, except the Lower Fox, in Wisconsin, where the river is a series of impassable rapids. There are a few very short lateral canals on foreign rivers, but they are only used to cut off sharp bends, and they are made and kept both wide and deep. No estimate has been made of the cost of these suggested changes, but it was thought advisable to call attention to them, as they are modifications which will undoubtedly be called for at some future date.

There are valuable tracts of land belonging to the State of Ohio, purchased for the Muskingum improvement, which will revert to the United States in case of the acceptance of the offer of the State. The funds available for the survey did not permit a thorough examination of these lands with an investigation of the titles by which they are held, but a very large amount of information was obtained, and the work can be completed at some future date should it become necessary. It may be assumed that the State owns as much land as is required for the maintenance and protection of its works, and much more than will be necessary in case the lateral canals should be abandoned or turned over to the mill-owners who use the canals as head races.

At the majority of the dams the State of Ohio has leased water-power to mills.

The following table, compiled by Mr. Gregory, shows the locality, ownership, and condition of these leases:

The continued use of these powers for manufacturing purposes should be preserved, as the people are as much benefited by cheap manufactures as by cheap transportation; but some of the leases have unusual conditions which may operate to the injury of navigation, whereas the latter interest is undoubtedly entitled to precedence. All these matters can doubtless be adjusted, as the longest of these leases expires in 1905.

To sum up, it will require an immediate appropriation of $200,000 to put the locks and dams on the Muskingum River in good order. A small dredge-boat will be required, at an estimated cost of $5,000; the annual expenditures will be $25,000 for repairs, $8,500 for salaries, and $2,500 for dredging; the annual income from rents will be $4,000. The net annual cost of maintaining navigation on the Muskingum River will therefore be $32,000.

In the above no account has been taken of the Muskingum ice-harbor project, which is an independent work which should be carried on to completion without regard to the remainder of the river.

I am required by the river and harbor act to state "the improvements proper to be made." As applied to this particular case, I understand that I am expected to give my opinion as to whether or not the United States should accept the tender of the State of Ohio. As the locks and dams on the Muskingum are in much better condition than were those of the Kentucky River when a similar tender on the part of the State of Kentucky was accepted by the United States, and as the United States would probably expend much larger sums in building locks and dams on this river if no improvement had ever been made on it, I unhesitatingly recommend the acceptance of the offer made by the State of Ohio.

Accompanying this report is an outline map of the basin of the Muskingum River, showing the sites of the eleven dams and also the present lines of land and water transportation within this basin.

I have added a copy of one of the water-power leases at Zanesville, in order to show the general character of these leases. It is proper to state, however, that, as a rule, the water-power leases on this river are simpler in form and impose fewer conditions.

Respectfully submitted.

WM. E. MERRILL,
Lieut. Col. Engineers.

Brig. Gen. JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

The report made by Hon. John B. Gregory, under employment by Colonel Merrill, of the engineers, says:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, December 15, 1885.

COLONEL: In compliance with instructions contained in your letter of December 20, 1884, I have the honor to submit the following report of an examination of the Muskingum River, from the town of Zanesville to the town of Marietta at its mouth and junction with the Ohio River, omitting the lock and dam at Marietta.

REPORT.

The Muskingum River is the largest river in Ohio, draining about 6,250 square miles of territory. It is formed at Coshocton by the junction of the Walhonding and the Tuscarawas. The mouth is nearly due south of the head of the Tuscarawas. The valley of the Tuscarawas, which approaches at its northern bend within 6 miles of the Cuyahoga, and the valley of that river, were selected by the State of Ohio in 1826 for the location of the Ohio Canal, which follows the valleys of these streams from Cleveland to Dresden, where a side canal connects it with the navigable waters of the Muskingum. About the same time some improvements in the line of wing-dams were built in the Muskingum to improve the navigation of its waters, but not until the year 1838 was the present plan adopted and operations begun for its execution. The cost of the improvement was $1,628,028.29. This river furnishes navigation more reliable than the Ohio above Marietta; when the water is too low for business on the latter stream, boats often seek the Muskingum trade. It could be extended to Coshocton, and perhaps to the mouth of the Sandy, above New Philadelphia, with a view ultimately to a ship-canal to Cleveland. Such an extension, if found practicable, would result in a large commerce between Lake Erie and the Ohio River.

The length of the present improvement is 91 miles. There are twelve locks and eleven dams, as shown by profile attached to this report and marked B. The locks on this improvement are 36 feet wide, and 175 feet in chamber, the entire length being 228 feet, except the upper one above Zanesville, which is 22 feet wide and 120 feet long in chamber only. The dams first built were of the form known as the "log cabin," as shown in figure "C." This form was in a few years found to be very unsatisfactory and unsafe, and required an entire reconstruction. The typical form of dam then adopted and still used and approved on this river is shown in figure "D."

The following table shows the length of the improvement, lift of locks, length of dams, character of foundations, length of canals at dams where there are any, and location of draw-bridges:

About $1,628,028.29 should be credited to the construction account. This leaves the receipts as above and the expenditures $704,571.26.

From June 2, 1861, until May 15, 1878, the public works of the State were leased to a company called "The Lessees of the Public Works." Hon. George W. Manypenny, who was a member of the company, states that the books have been destroyed, and is not able to say positively whether the Muskingum improvement was a source of profit or loss to the company.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE WORKS.

The Muskingum River was found in good navigable condition, with all locks and dams in working order. The works, however, need considerable repairs to insure their safety in the near future.

The condition of the work in detail and the cost of these repairs, in addition to the regular current repairs at each point, are given in the following statements:

Zanesville.—The dam here is founded on hard rock and appears to be very good. The lower end of the west abutment appears to be poor, while the east abutment is very good. The walls of the guard-lock and the other locks are fair. The gates of the guard-lock are poor, and at nearly every lock on this river the condition of the sheeting and miter-sills is not good. I have at every lock estimated for pumping it out, puddling between the timbers, and resheeting one-half the lock; also repairing the miters and grouting the wall of the locks. The canal is shallow and requires dredging.

Taylorsville.—The dam at this point, being the longest on the river (840 feet), and having a good rock bottom, has given but little trouble and is supposed to be in good repair. Guard-gates and wooden cribs protecting guard-lock and crib below lock are poor. Guard-lock needs repairs to masonry. The lock here is one of the poorest on the river. The face of the stone on the inner side of the lock, between low-water and ordinary high-water marks, is badly disintegrated and scaled off. An estimate of the cost of taking down the inner walls of the lock, replacing the defective stones with new ones, and relaying the good stones, is herewith made for this and other locks, supposing that in each case about 8 feet of the bottom of the lock will not require relaying.

Eagleport or Rokely.—One hundred and eighty feet of the west end of this dam was washed out in 1883 and rebuilt. The balance of the dam is fair, except about 50 feet of the sheeting is gone from lower apron. It also received extensive repairs in 1882. The foundation is gravel, and it has been a difficult dam to maintain. I would recommend that the foot of this dam, and all of those having gravel foundations, be protected with heavy stones, none of which should weigh less than 2 tons, and estimates are made for the same. The west abutment is a wooden crib requiring to be rebuilt soon. The lower end of the west wall of the lock, about 48 feet, is cracked and sunken. It was caused by the sheeting of the lock giving out in 1879, and the water washing under the lock. The face of the stone in the lock is somewhat disintegrated; not badly except in the lower recesses and jaws.

McConnelsville.—The dam at this place is good and probably requires little beside current repairs. The coping of the west abutment is off. Guard gates poor. East abutment of dam is crib-work; not very bad, but I have estimated for new cribs. The east wall of the lock appears to be hollow, a little out of line, and leaks badly. The stones are not badly disintegrated, except the lower recesses; perhaps one-fourth of the length of the walls would require rebuilding, and the east wall extra grouting.

Lake Chute.—The appearance of the dam is not good, and it is one of the dams which has proved troublesome in the past. In repairing, the central part has been left with only two falls. Instead of an abutment at the east end there is a crib so built as to afford an additional spill during high water. It should be rebuilt, though not very old. Lock is good except one pair of gates.

Beverly.—The dam looks well and is said to be good. The coping of the east abutment has been carried off. The lower end of the west abutment is a crib. Devols.—The appearance of the dam is not extra, but it is said to be in good condition and to need only the usual attentions. Cribs at lock poor. West wall of the lock is pretty badly disintegrated or spalled off. The stones in this wall were largely laid on their edges instead of the natural beds. This is not the case in the east wall, and it is pretty good except the lower recess. The mill-race at the back of the east wall should be turned away from it, as it has a tendency to injure it.

REMARKS.

In answer to the interrogatory as to the practicability of abandoning some or all of the side canals and substituting locks adjacent to the dams, I would say, from a careful examination, with measurements of each of the different points to be changed, I am clearly of the opinion that the side canals can all be abandoned and locks built at the ends of these dams. Such a change would do away with the delays caused by having to pass through long, narrow, shallow, and crooked canals. They have proved a great obstruction to the successful navigation of the river. Six of the eleven dams have locks at their ends and five have canals. The canal at Zanesville affords good landings, and as boats generally stop near the lower end it would be of no advantage to make the change at this point. At Taylorsville there is a long canal subject to much wash from the gravel banks and from Slago Run. It would improve it to pass the run under the canal by a culvert.

The canal is so built as to reduce the width of the river near the lock to about 250 feet, rendering it incapable of passing the water in time of extreme freshets and making the maintenance of this canal one of the most expensive items on the improvement. Between the lock and the foot of the dam there is a decided fall of probably 3 feet. It would be necessary to either blast out a channel through the rock or to raise the dam at Eagleport, or both, if the lock should be moved up to the present dam. Blasting out the channel would be so costly that it would be better probably to abandon both the present dam and lock and build them both anew at a point about 1,000 feet above the present lock. The foundation would probably be rock. The State owns sufficient ground here for the change to be made on it. The present site of the lock was chosen because it afforded a rock bottom, and it would not had the channel been left wider.

The level to Eagleport below this dam would be much improved by raising the Eagleport dam 1 foot. The canal at McConnelsville is short and easily kept clear, offering no great impediment to navigation. A lock could be placed just west of the west abutment of the dam. It would have a rock foundation, would be right for the current and would avoid the present trouble at the lock, where the miter sill is too high in low water. It would not require any great expense outside of the new lock, and raising Windsor dam 1 foot. Raising the dam at Windsor would greatly improve the level which now requires dredging at one place.

The Beverly Canal, which is like that at McConnelsville, could be dispensed with also. Probably the lock would be best located on the west side of the dam. The foundations would be doubtful. This point would require careful surveys and soundings to determine on which end of the dam to place it, however.

The canal at Lowell is long, very crooked, and fills rapidly and often with sediment from Cats Creek, which empties into it near the head. It could be easily shortened and Cats Creek turned out of it, but in the event of a change it would be better to dispense with the canal altogether. I am informed that the removal of a rock reef, which is 200 or 300 yards long and 2½ feet below the surface in low water, would make a good channel at the west end of the dam. The foundation at this end would be rock.

In this connection it may be stated that there are some other improvements which in the future may seem desirable, in the way of substituting slope-walls above water for cribs protecting locks; substituting stone abutments for wooden cribs at east end of McConnelsville and Luke Chute dams and west ends of Eagleport and half of west abutment at Beverly: also lengthening Luke Chute dam

100 feet and Eagleport dam 50 feet; but these improvements are not deemed essential at the present time, and our estimates are made for repairing and rebuilding on the present plan.

COMMERCE NOW DEPENDENT ON THE MUSKINGUM RIVER.

Regular trips are made each day by two steamers, one leaving Zanesville for Parkersburg and the other returning each day, and three other steamers running shorter trips. Besides these there are a number of barges conveying coal and oil in bulk. The boats range in tonnage from 100 to 250 tons. It would be practicable to run steamers of 500 tons when the water is above the average stage, and of 350 tons at such average stage as could be most always found. The county of Muskingum, with a population of 49,612; the county of Morgan, with 20,074, and Washington County, with 43,264 population, are largely dependent on this stream. Morgan County, having no railroads, is entirely dependent on it for transportation.

Thus it will be seen that this work is a reality, and not in any sense prospective. I submit a map of this splendid river and its rich environments. [See next page.]

The purpose is not to make money out of the Government. The purpose is twofold. First, to take this splendid improvement out of the management of the State of Ohio, crippled as it is because of the weight of those long lines of canals which are running the State heavily in debt each year. The second purpose is to give to the navigation of the river the improvement which it is entitled to have whenever it shall have become a part of the national work.

Mr. LONG. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has stated what the conditions are to which this grant is subject. If he has already stated them I do not ask him to repeat them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They simply transfer all the land. The State of Ohio acquired by purchase at all these locks and dams land, valuable land. Along these canals, that are from one-fifth of a mile to a mile and a half in length, all the land is owned by the State of Ohio, and they transfer that. The only condition incumbent upon the Government is that they accept the work and make it a part of the navigable streams of the United States. No other condition is attached to the cession by the State of Ohio. I have the act before me. It is one of the public acts of the State, passed about a year ago. They transfer absolutely all the property of the State in the public works.

I submit the act:

An act to grant the consent of the State of Ohio to the acquisition by the United States of certain lands within the State and bordering on the navigable rivers thereof, for the purpose of constructing canals or erecting thereon dams, abutments, locks, lock-keepers' dwellings, offices, and all necessary structures for the construction and maintenance of slack-water navigation on said rivers, and ceding jurisdiction over the same, and for imposing fines and penalties for willful injuries to the grounds, buildings, and appurtenances acquired under the provisions of this act.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That whenever the United States shall make an appropriation, and shall be about to begin the improvement of any of the navigable rivers within or bordering on the State of Ohio, by means of locks and permanent removable dams, or dams with adjustable chutes, or by means of a canal, the consent of the State of Ohio is hereby given to the acquisition by the United States, by purchase or by condemnation of any lands, buildings, or other property necessary for the purpose of erecting thereon dams, abutments, locks, lock-keepers' dwellings, chutes, and other necessary structures for the construction and maintenance of slack-water navigation on said rivers, or for the purpose of constructing canals on the same, and the said United States shall have, hold, use, and occupy the said land or lands, buildings, or other property, when purchased or acquired as provided for by this act, and shall exercise jurisdiction and control over the same; but the State of Ohio reserves the right to execute process lawfully issued under its authority within and upon said grounds, rivers, sites, and canals.

SEC. 2. That in case of failure of the United States to agree with the owner or owners of any such lands as the United States may deem necessary for the purpose named in the first section of this act, it shall be lawful for the United States to apply for the condemnation of such land by petition to any judge of a court of record in or nearest to the county where the land may be situated, either in term time or in vacation, notice of the time and place of such application having been first duly given by publication for thirty days prior to the day of such application in two newspapers of general circulation published in the county where the land lies, or if the owner or owners reside in the State of Ohio, by personal service upon the owner or owners of such land at least twenty days prior to such application. And thereupon it shall be lawful for such judge to appoint three disinterested freeholders of the county where such lands lie as commissioners, and having been first duly sworn to well and duly appraise the damages due the owner or owners of said land proposed to be taken, shall report in writing to the said judge the amount of damages to be paid to the owner or owners of said land, which report, upon confirmation by said judge, shall be held as final and binding upon said owner or owners of said land, and upon the amount of such damages being paid to the owner or owners of said land the title of such land shall vest in the United States, and said land shall be exempt from all taxes and assessments so long as it shall remain the property of the United States.

SEC. 3. That if any person or persons shall willfully or maliciously injure any of the lands, buildings, or other property acquired or held under the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall be liable to a fine of not less than $20, and to an imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, or either, at the discretion of the court, said offense to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 4. And for the purpose of enabling the United States to expend any sum of money that is or may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for the improvement of the Muskingum River, the State of Ohio hereby transfers and cedes to the United States the eleven locks and dams heretofore constructed by said State on said river, together with all the grounds, canals, and appurtenances belonging to the same, subject to the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, as to the jurisdiction of the United States over the lands and buildings authorized to be acquired and constructed by said sections, and imposing penalties for injuries to said work, [which] shall extend and apply to the said eleven locks and dams and their appurtenances hereby transferred and ceded to the United States, but the custody and ownership of said Muskingum River improvement shall remain in the State of Ohio until such time as the United States appropriates sufficient money to properly improve and operate the same.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Passed May 2, 1885.

I have already spoken about the surplus water. I have the terms of the lease here. They convey only the surplus water; they give to the lessee of the works no right as against the paramount claim of the Government to use the water for the purposes of navigation. The water rents are a source of revenue to the extent of $4,000 a year, which will amount to more than one-third of the entire expense of supervision and control.

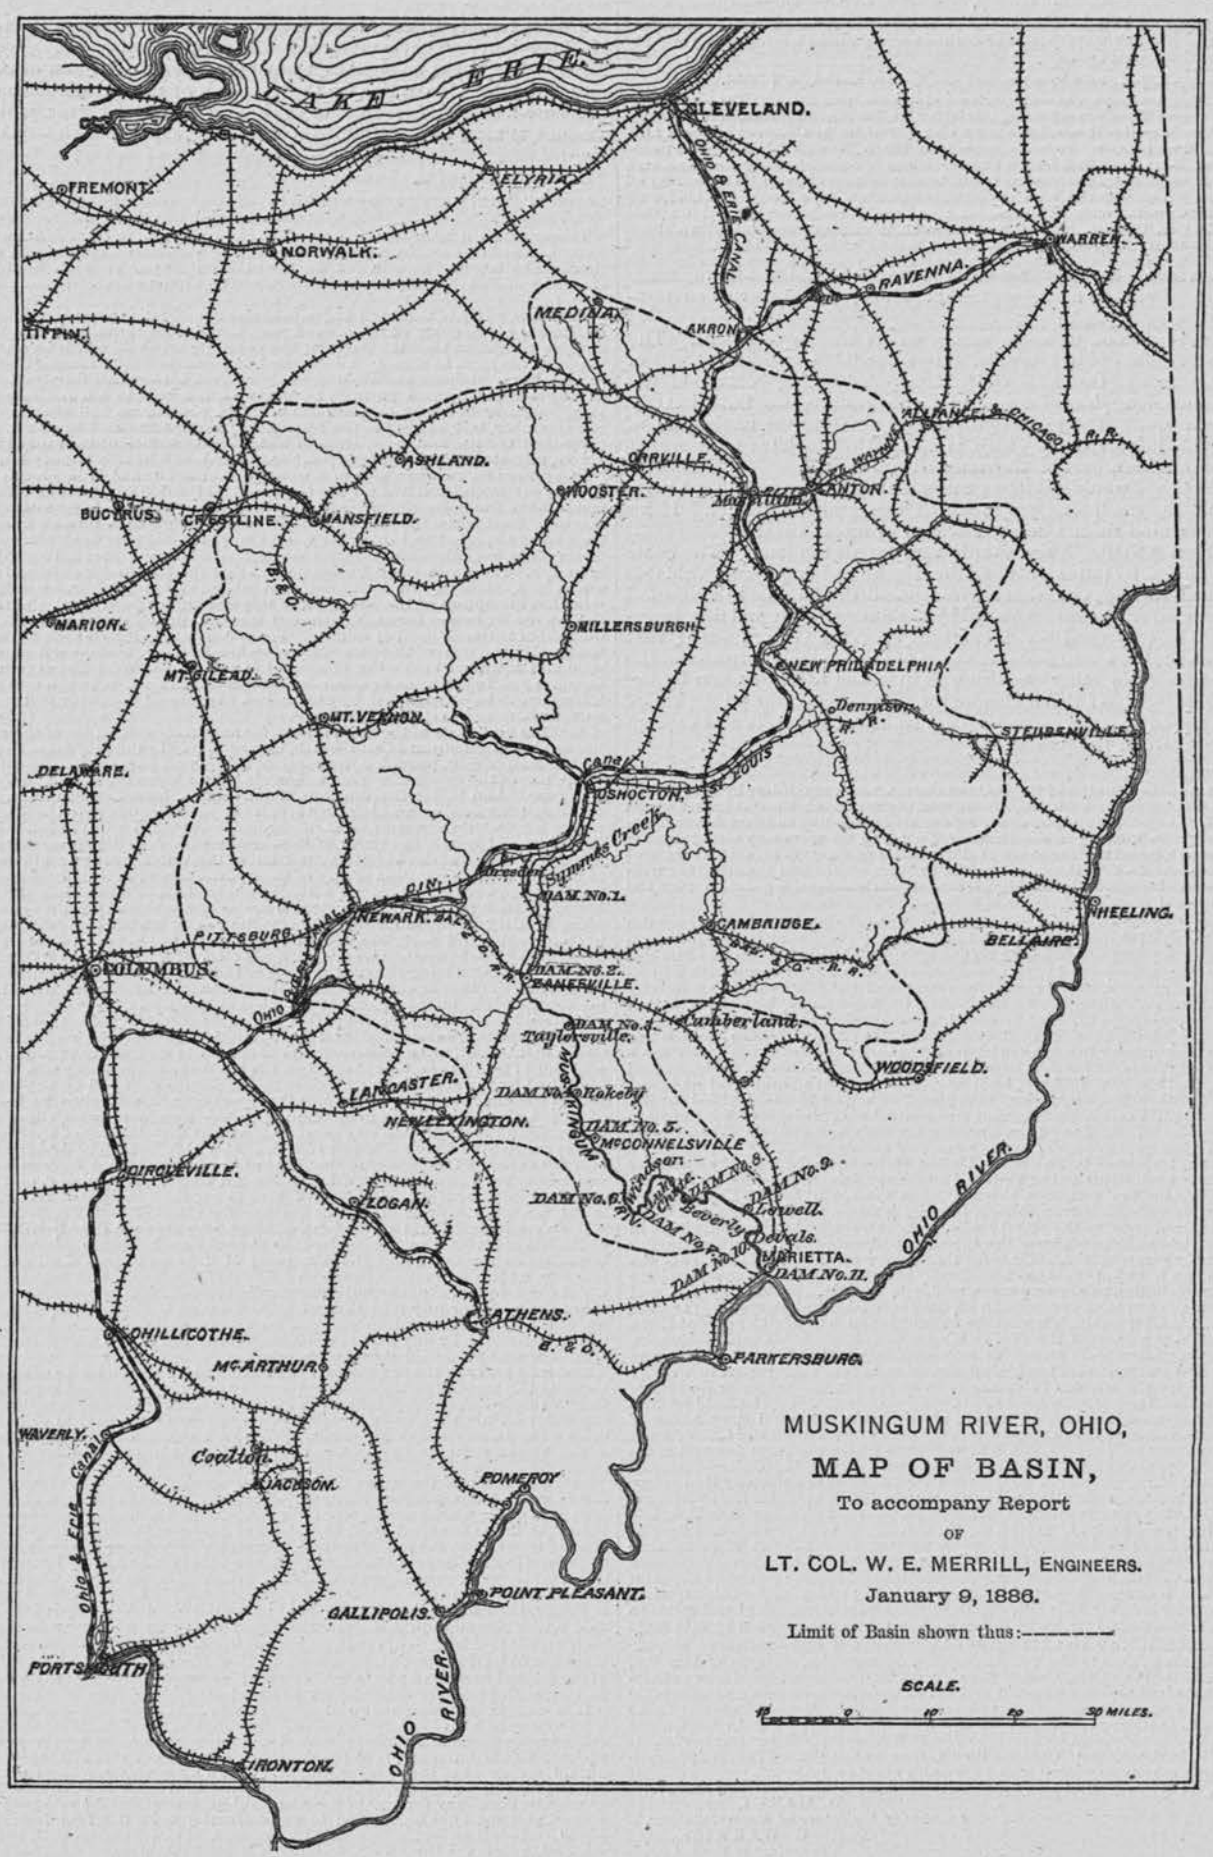
I submit one of the leases:

LEASE OF THE WATER-POWER ON THE MUSKINGUM RIVER AT ZANESVILLE, OHIO.

This agreement made this 7th day of December, 1871, between the State of Ohio, party of the first part, by James Moore, acting commissioner, thereto duly authorized by law and by order of the board of public works, made in pursuance thereof, and F. A. Thompson, of Zanesville, Ohio, party of the second part, witnesseth:

That said party of the first part, in consideration of the rents reserved, and the covenants of the party of the second part, hereinafter contained, and upon the express condition that the party of the second part shall continue during the whole of his term to comply with all and singular the limitations and conditions hereinafter contained, and shall in every respect perform all the stipulations of this agreement by said party to be performed, agrees to sell and lease to said party of the second part, for the term of thirty years, from and after the 1st day of September, 1871, subject to the restrictions, limitations, and conditions herein contained, the use and occupation of water-power sufficient to propel five run of 4½-foot mill-stones at the rate to flour 150 bushels of wheat in twenty-four hours.

The power for two run of stones to be permanent or available eleven months in the year, or entitled to a ratable reduction for the deficiency. The other three run to have the necessary machinery with reaction wheels to be available only and only used when the Muskingum River is so high as to furnish more water than can be applied to low-water machinery, and may be used whenever the water flows over the dam so as not to interfere with low-water mills or by means of its use. It is understood by the parties that the two first-mentioned powers are to be applied in low water to breast wheel, and in high water to reaction wheel at the option of the lessee; and it is also understood by the parties that the low-water power for each of the two first-mentioned run of stones is to be at the rate of 550 cubic feet per minute. The water hereby leased to be taken out of the level of the pool of the dam across the Muskingum, at Zanesville, and to be used and occupied below the abutment of the dam at West Zanesville, and to be conveyed to the mills or other hydraulic works from between two regulating weirs, to be constructed by and at the expense of the party of the second part, as hereinafter specified.



And the said party of the second part, for and in consideration of the rights to the use and occupation of said water, agrees to pay to the said State the yearly rent or sum of $500, provided the party of the second part shall not be deprived of the use of the two first-named run of stones for more than one month in any one year. And if, for the purpose of preventing breaches, removing bars or other obstructions, or making any repairs or improvements to the dam or the works connected therewith, or in consequence of breaches or the inadequacy of the supply of water, the party of the second part shall be either partially or wholly deprived of the use of any portion of the water-power hereby leased so as to prevent the operation of any of the hydraulic works usually propelled by the water-power hereby leased, such deduction shall be made from the rent accruing on such portion of the water-power as the said party is prevented from using as will bear the same proportion to the yearly rent thereof as the time during which the said party has been deprived of its use bears to eleven months; the rent to be paid semi-annually, on the 1st day of May and November in each and every year, during the continuance of the lease, to the collector of tolls at Zanesville, or other agent of the State duly authorized to receive the same, having charge of the improvement of the Muskingum River.

And said party of the second part further agrees to erect at his own expense, in a good, secure, substantial, and workmanlike manner, the regulating weirs above mentioned, to be constructed of stone walls and plates of wood, with a substantial iron bar securely bolted on the top thereof, agreeably to a plan to be furnished by the acting commissioner or engineer, employed on any adjoining part of the improvement, and under the direction and subject to the inspection of such acting commissioner or engineer; the weir over which the water is drawn from the dam to be so placed and formed that the top of the weir shall not be more than 6 inches below the level at which it shall be designed to sustain the surface of the water in that part of the improvement from whence the water is to be drawn, and the other or second weir to be so placed and formed that the top thereof will be at least 1 inch lower than the top of the weir over which the water is drawn from the basin or dam, and of such length and otherwise so constructed that an uniform quantity of water will flow from the upper to the lower levels whether the hydraulic works are in operation or not; and it is further expressly agreed that the party of the second part shall not for any purpose, or in any manner whatever, obstruct the equal and regular flow of water from one level of the improvement to another, nor increase the flow, nor cause the water or any part thereof to flow out of the dam, other than for the use of the mills, nor shall the party of the second part permit any of said acts or things to be done by any person or persons employed in or about the mill or hydraulic works propelled by water hereby leased.

And said party of the second part shall be considered and held responsible for keeping the regulating weir above described constantly in good repair and free from all obstructions; and a failure to do so, or an interference with the flow of the water on his part, or on the part of any person employed in or about said mills or hydraulic works aforesaid, shall be adjudged a forfeiture of this lease and of all the rights and privileges of the said party growing out of this agreement.

And said party of the second part further agrees, during the continuance of this lease, to keep constantly in good order and repair the weir, head and tail race, and other works and devices connected with the use of the water hereby leased, so far as the same shall be necessary to secure the regular and uniform flow of water from the upper to the lower levels, or to prevent any impediment to the navigation improvement; and if, nevertheless, any such breach, bar, or other injury or impediment should occur in consequence of any of said works not being faithfully and substantially constructed, or being suffered to be out of repair, then said party of the second part shall, on being notified thereof by said acting commissioner, engineer, or other proper agent of the State, immediately repair said breach or other injury; or if such agent of the State shall cause the same to be done (which he is authorized at his option to do), then said party of the second part shall pay to said agent all necessary expenses incurred in repairing such breach or other injury on demand.

It is expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties that for the purpose of preventing or repairing breaches in the dam, removing bars or other obstructions to the navigation of said improvement, or for the purpose of making any improvements to the works or devices connected therewith, any authorized agent of the party of the first part may cause the water to be drawn either partially or wholly out of the same, and to remain so drawn out so long as may be necessary for any of the aforesaid purposes, and the said party of the second part shall not be entitled to any deduction from the rent hereby made payable other than for the time the two first-named run of stones shall be thereby stopped, unless the three high-water stones shall be stopped also, and in that case a ratable deduction shall be made for them also; and the party of the first part reserves the right to resume at any time the use of the water hereby leased whenever the same shall become necessary for the purposes of navigation, and to continue the use thereof so long as the same shall be necessary for the purpose aforesaid. And if it shall become necessary for the party of the first part to resume the use of so great a portion of the water hereby leased, or of the whole thereof, for so great a portion of the time as to defeat the object of this lease by destroying the value of the privilege (which fact shall be determined by three judicious, disinterested freeholders, one to be chosen by the acting commissioner or other authorized agent of the State, one by the party of the second part, and the third by the two thus chosen), then the party of the second part shall be from such time absolved from all further liabilities growing out of this agreement.

And it is further understood and agreed that at the expiration of this agreement the party of the second part shall be entitled to a renewal of the lease for a like term of years, for such annual rent as may be offered by the highest responsible bidder, who shall also agree to purchase of said party of the second part all permanent and valuable buildings necessarily erected by said party for the convenient use of the water-power hereby leased, at such price as such buildings shall be adjudged to be worth by three judicious, disinterested freeholders, to be chosen as hereinbefore specified, provided such buildings shall be erected on land belonging to the State, or land which can be purchased by said bidder at a reasonable price, to be determined by said appraisers. And if no such bid shall be made on the terms aforesaid at a higher rent than is herein specified said party shall be entitled to such renewal on the terms of this lease. And it is further understood and agreed that the water-power hereby leased shall not be used to drive or propel any saw-mill or other machinery, or other works from which sawdust, chips, or other rubbish will be likely to be carried, thrown, or floated into the improvement or the channel to convey water to other mills, so as to form bars or other obstructions to the navigation in the said river or to clog the gates, waste weirs, or regulating weirs, or otherwise injure or obstruct the same.

The party of the second part shall at all times be bound to keep the improvement clear of all rubbish or other obstructions consequent in any manner on the use of the water hereby leased or of the works or machinery erected therefor.

And the said party of the first part, in consideration of the rents and agreements hereinbefore specified, further agrees to lease to the party of the second part, upon the same condition and subject to the same limitations and restrictions herein contained, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in the county of Muskingum, below said abutment, butted, bounded, and described as follows, namely: Beginning at the most southwestern corner of the abutment of t he dam at Zanesville, in West Zanesville, and running in a southerly direction with the water edge at low water, extending, when reduced to a straight line, 100 feet below the abutment; thence in a western direction and at right angles to the first-named line until it shall intersect Water street in West Zanesville; thence with the said street in a northern direction until a line run parallel with the second-named line shall close at the place of beginning, reserving to the State the right to pass the water in any manner pointed out by the acting commissioner or engineer having charge of the improvement of Muskingum River to any mills heretofore erected or hereafter to be erected on the margin of the river below. The lease of the above-described land is for the purpose of enabling the party of the second part to use and enjoy the use of the water-power hereby leased for the like term of thirty years from the 1st day of September, 1871.

It is further understood and agreed that said party of the second part shall not sell, assign, or transfer his right or interest derived from this agreement, or any part thereof, to any person or persons, unless the assent of some authorized agent of the State shall first be obtained therefor in writing.

And if at any time any installment which shall become due for rent, as hereinbefore expressed, shall remain unpaid for one month from the time the same shall fall due, or if the party of the second part shall in any respect fail to fulfill and perform all the engagements of said party hereinbefore expressed, or shall do or permit to be done any act or thing hereby prohibited, or shall in any respect violate this agreement, then, and in either case, all the rights and privileges derivable to said party from this agreement shall from the time of such failure or violation cease and determine, and any authorized agent of the State or lessee under said State shall have full right and power to enter upon and take possession of the premises, and resume all the rights and privileges hereby granted to the party of the second part, and said party of the second part shall moreover be liable for all damages consequent upon such violation of this agreement.

The party of the first part also agrees to let to the party of the second part, for the term of thirty years, and subject to the same limitations and restrictions as above, the following described plat of land, namely: Beginning at the most northwestern corner of said abutment and running in a western direction at right angles with the abutment until the said line shall intersect Water street in West Zanesville; thence in a northern direction with said street 180 feet; thence in an easterly direction parallel with the first-named line until the line shall intersect the river at low-water mark; thence with the meanders of the river at low-water mark in a southwesterly direction to the abutment, and thence to the place of beginning.

This lease is given in renewal of a lease executed to R. Fairlamb on the 11th of August, 1839. An order of the board reduced the rent from $999 per annum to $500, and another order reduced it to $500 per annum.

In testimony whereof the parties executed this agreement the day and year first above written.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the terms of the act of the Legislature of Ohio require the Government to keep up these locks and dams?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir; there is nothing of the sort in the requirement; but if there was, my friend knows it would have no possible force. This is a navigable river of the United States, and no terms that the State Legislature might impose could have any binding force upon the Government. However, there is no such condition contained in the act.

Mr. Chairman, as I represent in the House a portion of the valley through which this beautiful river flows I take an honest pride in pointing out the beauties and values of this splendid valley.

I have a right to demand on behalf of my constituents that this great interest shall receive the fostering care of the General Government.

I hope the motion of the gentleman from Texas will not prevail.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment by way of a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment reported from the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 865 and 866, strike out the words "passed and taken" and insert "which took."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to amend by inserting after the words "eighty-six," in line 877 of the bill, the proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the custody and ownership of said Muskingum River improvement shall be vested in the United States without condition, and the foregoing provisions shall not take effect until the State of Ohio shall duly consent to this provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. In connection with that amendment, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the fourth section of an act of the Ohio Legislature, passed May 2, 1885, which I send to the desk, be read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I desire to have this section of the Ohio law read at any rate, so that the committee can see just how that matter stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. And for the purposes of enabling the United States to expend any sum of money that is or may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for the improvement of the Muskingum River, the State of Ohio hereby transfers and cedes to the United States the eleven locks and dams heretofore constructed by said State on said river, together with all the grounds, canals, and appurtenances belonging to the same, subject to the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, as to the jurisdiction of the United States over the lands and buildings authorized to be acquired and constructed by said sections, and imposing penalties for injuries to said work (which) shall extend and apply to the said eleven locks and dams and their appurtenances hereby transferred and ceded to the United States; but the custody and ownership of said Muskingum River improvement shall remain in the State of Ohio until such time as the United States appropriates sufficient money to properly improve and operate the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. The object of my amendment was simply to get rid of this extraordinary provision, which is to the effect that while the Government is appropriating money, as much as it thinks proper if not as much as the State of Ohio thinks proper, the custody and ownership of this property shall remain in the State of Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I accept the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. One word more. While I offer this amendment for the purpose of perfecting this provision of the pending bill, I am opposed to the whole provision. Here are eleven locks, an artificial channel, a canal if you please—as much so for practical purposes as the Erie Canal; do we consider to what extent the adoption of this provision would increase the public employés of this Government? Here you would have at once eleven lock-keepers to supervise and manage this artificial channel, with their employés and subordinates. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] spoke admirably to-day on this general subject of the increase of the public burdens; yet steadily, as time moves on, we are increasing from day to day the already vast body of the employés of this Government, while at the same time we are deploring the ultimate results. Sir, I think that to assume for the Federal Government charge of this canal, this local improvement, with the army of men required to manage its affairs, is as unwise a step as this Congress can take.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am afraid that that will cause delay, and I think it ought not to be adopted.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, commencing in line 864, the following words: "Subject to the conditions in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, which took effect on the 2d day of May, 1885."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the paragraph from line 856 to line 887, inclusive of said two lines.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, this bill contains several provisions by which for the first time the United States goes into the several States, and, either by purchase or by condemnation or by gift, is to become the proprietor of local works for navigation. When the first of these provisions was reached, that relating to the Monongahela River, I took occasion to express my dissent from the whole policy, for I felt that it was a new departure in the conduct of this Government, a dangerous innovation upon the traditions of the Republic. I would have said that it was an unconstitutional step, but I am aware that all the barriers erected by the Constitution, as we were taught in our youth to understand it, have long since been swept away by the successive decisions of the Supreme Court, so that I am ashamed to raise the constitutional question on any proposition that may be made in this House; but beyond and above the question of lawful power lies the question of ability to carry the load.

This Government is becoming the dumping-ground of all the unprofitable enterprises of the several States. These States are trying to shift the care of their local enterprises and the cost of maintaining them upon the broad shoulders of the whole people of this country. I am utterly and absolutely opposed to any such proposition. There is a measure pending in this House—not in this bill, but as a separate bill—proposing that the Government shall take the Erie Canal. I shall oppose that proposition whenever it may come up here for consideration. The people of New York are taxing themselves to-day nearly $1,000,000 per annum to keep that navigation open free for the use of the people of the United States. The people of the State of New York can afford to pay a million of dollars, ay, $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, in order to keep that work open; for it brings to them the trade of the great West, out of which, as has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON], the people of New York derive millions of profit annually.

Let each State bear its own burden. If any State has built a public work which has proved to be a bad investment, let it pay for the maintenance of the work or else abandon it. Let it not come here and ask the people of the United States to pay for all the blunders and all the extravagance that may have been committed at any time in its history. If the United States should enter upon the policy of relieving all the States from the care of works of this kind the burden will become, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has said, absolutely intolerable. In the case of the Monongahela it was said in the memorial which was laid upon our desks that the cost of maintaining the works there was $100,000 a year. That means the employment certainly of more than one hundred officials, who will be transferred from the pay of a private company to the pay of the Government of the United States. If the Erie Canal should be taken, at least fifteen hundred additional offices would be created.

Mr. OATES. Will my friend allow me to suggest that the census of 1880 shows that a considerable majority of all the canals constructed in the United States have been abandoned as utterly unprofitable?

Mr. HEWITT. I am aware of the fact, but I thank the gentleman from Alabama for calling the attention of the House to it. The truth is, the sum and substance, the very essence, of this proposition is that the United States shall become the proprietor of every water way, great and small, upon this continent; and then the taxes that will have to be levied in order to defray the current charges for the maintenance of these systems of free navigation will become so onerous that this Government must break down under the load. Already, according to a table which I hold in my hand, furnished by the Register of the Treasury, we levied in the last year a tax of $4.57 upon every inhabitant of the United States for Federal expenses, so that a man and his wife, with three children (estimating a family to consist of five members), are paying nearly $20 a year out of their hard earnings in order to keep this great governmental machine in operation. Yet gentlemen come here with propositions which will lead to the unlimited increase of these expenditures.

Assume the charge of all these works, and the United States will be the great employer of labor, and the men who occupy the seats of Government here in the White House and the Executive Departments will be the masters of an enslaved and enthralled people. Liberty never yet survived in any government where the expenditures had passed the ordinary limit and ability of the people to pay taxes. Least of all can free government endure among any people where a large proportion of the population are living in public employment upon the earnings of the remainder. Hence we should seek to diminish and not to increase the proportion of those who, deriving their support from the public Treasury, thus become the tools of unscrupulous rulers.

In 1837 we were paying for Federal expenses $2.38 per head, and in 1845, under wise and Democratic administration—I say "wise and Democratic," for there may be unwise and Democratic administration—taxation was brought down to $1.15 per capita. And now, after a long and courageous struggle for economy, begun in 1875 under the lead of gentlemen whom I see before me who were then members of the Committee on Appropriations, we have succeeded in getting the ordinary expenditures of the Government down from $7.07 in 1874 to $4.57 per capita in 1885. And yet the burden of long years of taxation is so intolerable that the people are suffering in the midst of abundance, so that they refuse to labor for current wages, not knowing whence comes the wrong which paralyzes industry and has brought about all this restlessness and discontent in the public mind. Excessive taxes impoverish the people and produce strikes, lockouts, and violence.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the money out of the public Treasury and pay the public debt, and times will improve.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT. I prefer not to yield, because none of these questions can affect the matter which is in my mind and which will control my vote upon this bill; for if these provisions remain——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BEACH obtained the floor and said: I yield my five minutes to my colleague [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT. I thank my colleague, but will occupy only one or two minutes more. It may seem ungracious for the Representative of a city for which appropriations necessarily large are annually made in this bill to get up here and say that he can not support measures looking, as some gentlemen here believe, to the welfare and prosperity of other portions of the country. But so convinced am I of the dangerous tendency of such legislation as is contained in this section of the bill, that if the port of New York is closed up so that no steamer can enter it; if the public spirit of my fellow-citizens is not equal in such an emergency to provide for opening its channels at their own cost; and if my own State is not true to her grand history from the time of DeWitt Clinton, when its great lines of internal improvement were inaugurated at its own cost and have been so maintained down to the present time; if her sons to-day are so degenerate that they are no longer worthy of the great destiny and the priceless heritage which has come down to them from noble sires, then I say let New York perish, with the ships rotting at her wharves, for by my vote no dollar shall ever be appropriated to be expended in the harbor of New York, if the proposition be based upon and carries with it a policy which I know will be fatal to the liberties of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. I take the floor for the purpose of moving that the committee rise to close debate on this paragraph; but I will first ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Five minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. I will give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BAYNE. I want five minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee rise.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 95; noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480), making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. PAYSON. Make it five minutes; why don't you?

Mr. HEPBURN. Say an hour.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto has been limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. The understanding, of course, is that there shall be fifteen minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has drawn a very vivid and very dark picture of the present condition of the people of the United States. I do not object to looking upon that picture, but I object that he should draw from any paragraph in this bill the colors with which to paint the picture. What are the provisions to which he refers? The only provisions are those passed by the House yesterday touching the Green and Barren Rivers in my own State and the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania. And what were those provisions? Simply to bring before this Congress information in regard to three of the great rivers belonging to this Government. Will this information precipitate a crisis in public affairs if the next Congress should be placed in possession of the facts that the obstructions on the Green and Barren Rivers can be removed by the expenditure of $50,000 or $100,000, which is the utmost limit? And then coming to the Monongahela River, a monopoly whose influence is felt from one end of the Ohio Valley to the other and from one end of the great Mississippi Valley to the other, if the next Congress should, under the provisions of this bill, be placed in possession of the fact that great monopoly is willing, for a reasonable sum, to surrender its control over those vast coal fields, affecting the commercial prosperity of one-half of the Union, where are the direful consequences which are to follow?

Now, to come to this particular paragraph, what does it propose to do? Does it propose to empty the Treasury of the United States? Does it propose to engage an army of employés? I do not understand that it does. It merely says to the State of Ohio and to the United States, you have in your midst a large river bearing an immense commerce. You have in your own generosity, without appealing to the public Treasury as some of the States on the eastern coast have done, but clinging to the doctrine which prevented of availing yourself of the Federal money, you have by taxes of your own built an improvement on your own river, and having done so we are willing now to appropriate the small moderate sum of $20,000 to open up to free navigation of the country this beautiful river.

Is there anything monstrous in that? Is there anything direful to the country in that?

Mr. Chairman, I hold to-day this question of cheapening transportation is the burning question of the hour, and if by the expenditure of this paltry sum of $20,000 we can pour into the Ohio the free commerce coming down the Muskingum River I do not see there is any dreadful result to follow.

I have felt called upon to make these remarks in behalf of the action of the committee. There is no horrid monster here. It is a simple business proposition, to take from the State of Ohio as a free gift, not a dead improvement, not one which has not yielded a constant income, but a revenue improvement, one which that State believes may be better controlled in the interest of free navigation by the Federal Government than by itself. And that is all there is of this provision.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has certainly alarmed the House with the idea that the Government of the United States was about to be bankrupted because it was proposing to improve the internal rivers and water ways of this country. I would like to ask the gentleman, or any other Representative upon the floor of this House who agrees with him, what is this Government for? What do we collect taxes or revenue for? Is it simply for the purpose of paying our public officers? Is it merely for the purpose of erecting magnificent public buildings; of maintaining armies and navies? Or is it a Government of the people, which should do something in the interest of the people and not in the interest merely of public officials or public creditors?

I undertake to say here to-day that one cause of our depression, one cause of the misfortunes under which the country at times labors, grows out of the fact that the great amount of our public revenue, necessarily large to maintain the public credit as it should be maintained, is going to our public creditors instead of being distributed and put in circulation, as it might well be, among the people of the country, in doing something for them and in their interest. We collect a vast amount of revenue which is paid out to but few public creditors, and but little of the revenue goes out into the channels of industry. I repeat what the chairman of the committee has said, that the great question of the hour and of the day with the people all over the section of country where I live is cheap transportation. There is nothing in which they feel so deep an interest as they do in every measure which is calculated to give to them cheap transportation.

There is no measure of more vital importance to them. Mr. Chairman, the framers of the Constitution under which we live took from the States the power to raise revenue out of the commerce that passes into and out of them, because they believed the interstate commerce of the country should be exclusively within the control of the General Government.

They denied to the States the right to levy imposts or duties on imports or exports; they denied to the States, without consent of Congress, the right to lay any tonnage duty. Our revenues to-day come largely from the commerce of the country. It is by duties on imports largely by which we fill our Treasury, and it is reasonable and just that the Government should use some of the revenue which it derives from commerce to give all reasonable and proper facilities to commerce.

I am surprised that so intelligent a gentleman as my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] should be alarmed or apprehensive that the Government is going to rush into bankruptcy for the purpose of improving the water ways of the country. There is no danger of that. On the contrary, there is far more danger of our neglecting to make improvements which would enrich our people and make them more prosperous.

I assert here now that there is not a first-class civilized power on the globe but that has spent largely more money than we have for this very same purpose. England has been doing it for years; she has expended in the past ten or twenty years many millions of dollars. France has expended more by far than we have; and so has Germany and other first-class powers; for, as a matter of fact, the United States has been niggardly in improving its water ways and its commercial facilities in the interest of the people. But I do not fear anything from such expenditures when they are made for improvements which are really in the interest of the commerce of the country.

Judging from our past history, Mr. Chairman, there is no great danger of this Government entering upon a system of any great extravagance in improving our rivers and harbors and giving the people increased commercial facilities and cheap transportation. We have expended, I think, not more than $125,000,000 in our whole history; while England has done more than that within the last ten or fifteen years in cutting canals and in subsidizing railroads.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I can see no difference, either in nature or principle, between this provision of the bill now under consideration, providing for the acceptance from the State of Ohio of this still-water navigation, and a provision having in view the acceptance of the Erie Canal of the State of New York; and at the proper time I shall offer the amendment which was proposed by the gentleman from New York on yesterday to this paragraph.

I agree heartily in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] has said in regard to cheapening transportation. The acquisition and enlargement of the Erie Canal by the Government would do more to cheapen transportation than probably one-third, possibly one-half, of all the appropriations contained in this bill. That canal, in connection with the lake system of transportation, is to-day the only thing which is an operating factor controlling railway charges, and unless it be enlarged and unless the Government shall have such control of it as to enable the great freights of the West to be carried through it—I say that unless that be done, then the time may come and will come when the State of New York, which now collects no tolls upon it, will refuse to maintain the canal, and the railroads will have their long-hoped-for millennium.

For one, sir, and speaking for myself individually, the assertion that this amendment is not in the interest of commerce, the idea of negotiating for the Erie Canal in this river and harbor bill has nothing offensive to me. I wish to Heaven there were more of such provisions in this bill. In other words, instead of going all around the fringe of the continent, and appropriating simply sums for the improvement of insignificant waters, let the great water ways of the land be improved, and especially such a one as this canal, which would have a positive effect in cheapening transportation; and I hail this provision as one which lays the foundation for the future action of Congress with respect to the Erie and Hennepin Canals; because, if it is right and proper in effect to accept from the State of Ohio these locks and dams, this still-water navigation, then it is certainly just as right and proper to accept a canal between three and four hundred miles long and connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic.

I yield the remainder of my time back to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. I have very little to say on this occasion. I listened to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] this morning when he told us what had called the occupants of seats on the other side of the House to their places, and when he stood up to warn gentlemen there against extravagant administration. And I have listened to-day to my colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT], and the most I can do with him is to grieve with him that he and the gentleman from Illinois are the representatives of the past ages of the Democratic party. I say to these gentlemen, it is your committee that has brought in this bill and proposes the new departure of buying the works of the States and taking the control of them for the General Government. And I say to you gentlemen, you may unite with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and all three of you will be unable to hold down the brakes and stop the progress of your party and of this extravagance.

I have no doubt, and I congratulate the country upon it, that in a short time it will discover that all the specious promises that you made of reform and economy were simply cheating sounds to the ear; that they will discover your full purpose and that of your party, and call back to power the Republican party. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] I congratulate the country that so soon after you have taken possession—after you have come home, as you say—that so soon the country will discover that the warning voice of the leader of the House—the gentleman from Illinois—the prophecies and mournings of my colleague from New York, and the great constitutional arguments of the gentleman from Texas are ineffectual in stopping the extravagance which your committee has reported here to Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is entirely right when he states that all taxes are a burden upon the people; and the figures which he adduces for our consideration show a most striking contrast between the administration of the two parties in our country. But, sir, a tax upon the production of the people to supply the coffers of the Federal Government is no more and no less a burden upon their production than is a tax in the shape of high freight upon their commerce. If the $300,000,000 that we gather from them yearly to support the Federal Government be a burden, how great must be the burden of the well nigh $800,000,000 that they pay yearly to the unrestrained corporations of this country for carrying their produce to and from the markets.

How much of this is an unjust and needless burden I can not say; but the values given to watered stocks would indicate that it may approach even the burden of Federal taxes.

This is only one of many burdens of similar character imposed by Republican Congresses, and which as yet we are powerless to repeal. I say imposed by Republicans, for they refused to complete the passage into law of the interstate-commerce bill that a Democratic House sent them; and the tariff monopolies, yet more costly still, stand by their enactment and obstruction of reform. But even these are not all of the burdens that are grinding the people, and to which many seem blind.

Then, sir, the gentleman alludes to the centralizing tendency of our country. All that I have stated is centralization. What then can be more natural than for the people to show a disposition to go steadily to the Federal Government, there to exercise power, when the Federal Government has occasioned their trouble and refuses them relief and has turned them over to be governed and plundered by unrestricted charges upon their commerce by railroads and by artificial prices by subsidized industries? Do we expect them to discriminate about nice points when we disregard all points and set them the worst example of despotism? Have we not surrendered enough? Shall we now surrender to corporations the water ways of the country also that the Constitution gives us the control of and that we can improve in the interest of cheap freights? Shall we permit them to be usurped and possessed by default on our part? Have we not endowed corporations enough? A protest against this policy is not for centralization. It is for cheap and free distribution and exchange of products instead of submitting our commerce to any power, corporate or not corporate, to tax the life out of it. We may see centralization here upon the part of the great body of the people, taking the form of hasty, crude, and even revolutionary legislation, if you please, for the purpose of getting rid of existing centralization, breaking, in their own rude way, the idols and images of monopoly and prerogative, after all appeals have been disregarded with Bourbon blindness, and getting back to equal rights and equal laws. To keep our water ways for the people, and to keep them free to commerce and to make them adequate for commerce, is not centralization, nor is it a policy of expense.

I will speak of another feature in the matter of burdens. I have said that a tax upon commerce in the high freight charges is no less a burden upon the people than is a tax laid by the Federal Government upon the same commodities to replenish the Federal Treasury. There is no more chance of money getting back to the people when paid to railroads and steamboats and ships, and remitted to stockholders in the cities and in Europe, than there is if it is remitted by our custom-house officials and internal-revenue agents to the Treasury here in Washington. Now, that all expenditures for the improvement of our rivers and harbors are judicious, no man will pretend to say. That perhaps can never be. That great errors remain to be corrected, and ones that ought to be corrected, I am fully aware, and I have made earnest efforts in that direction, and I shall continue to make such efforts. But what I wish to emphasize upon the attention of the House is that the whole amount we expend yearly upon such relief works does not amount to 5 per cent. of the present annual exactions by corporations of freights that ought not to be charged. These expenditures once judiciously made are frequently paid back in freight savings in one year. Then the annual tax by corporations for all future years is stopped. Is this a policy of heaping burdens? Is it not rather a policy of wise and essential economy?

This, sir, does not take into account the expense of natural obstructions to our harbors which impose their annual expense upon commerce. Let us take two cases in point. One is a fleet of barges loaded with coal that was taken from Louisville to New Orleans by Capt. B. D. Wood. He took it down when the river was at high water, and navigation can be made as good at all seasons by judicious improvements. He carried this fleet at a profit at $25,000. By rail it would have cost $175,000. The jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River have paid us back their cost once in every two years since they were built. Was the tax to build them relatively a burden?

Sir, these matters should be considered. There is no expenditure made by the Federal Government that more richly blesses the people than that which is applied to the removal of charges upon their commerce. That gives them genuine relief. It blesses twice. It makes the food and the produce of this country cheaper to him who consumes and makes it bring a higher price to him who sells. And it is not difficult for us to realize the barriers that lie in the way of the people of our country in getting net results upon their production when we remember that if you will take a point in my State that is scarce 300 miles from the city of Saint Louis and measure its distance from Saint Louis by freight charges we are at that point twice as far from Saint Louis as New York is from Liverpool. If you will take a barrel of flour from my town 40 miles on a railroad and measure the distance by freight charges it is as far as New York is from Liverpool. If you will take cotton down the unimproved rivers of my State to New Orleans it is four times as far, measured by the logic of prices, as if you shipped that cotton from the city of New York across the Atlantic to the spindles of England.

I repeat, sir, are these charges not taxes resting on the people? Are they less a burden than if they were collected into the Federal Treasury instead of into the safes of the transportation companies to be transmitted to the stockholders in our remote cities or in Europe? It is clearly a burden which we can greatly ameliorate, and I think we need to go further to keep the range of this discussion. We need to bring the Federal Government back to economical expenditures as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], and also to relieve the people not only of unjust charges upon freight, but to relieve them also from the domination of other monopolies which the party of the other distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has imposed upon them. This, sir, is the function of the Democratic party, to bring this Government back to the people by the people and for the people, and to permit unjust taxation in no form, either by the Government or by the creations of the Government. That is the only way we can give genuine relief to the people. All other is sounding brass and tinkling cymbal and slavery in thin disguise.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, recurring to the subject under discussion, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this provision for the acquirement of this canal is unlike either of the provisions that have preceded it. They simply looked to negotiation, to reports, to future action on the part of the Government of the United States, while this is a finality, and by its adoption we assume charge of these locks, with all their burdens, with all their expenses and officials. We are adding, by the adoption of this paragraph, one hundred or more officials to the list that will appear next year in the Blue Book; we are adding all their salaries. We are adding $20,000 of annual cost for the mere operation of this work, to say nothing about what will be required to sustain and improve it.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not yield. I would be glad to if I could. I have but eight minutes. There is no doubt much truth in what the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has said of the gloomy prospects now lowering over this country and the financial distress everywhere to be found, but is it not true, sir, that we must look to other causes than the one that he suggests? The comparatively meager appropriations in this bill, $15,000,000 though they may be, will have but little effect in lightening distress or bringing relief to the people of this country. We must look to other and higher causes, and may we not find some cause for these difficulties the people suffer from in the fact that the people are afraid of those who are now dominant over them—afraid of the party now in power? Is it not true that there has been so much of promise and so little of performance upon the part of the Democratic party that the people look to the future with distrust and foreboding?

Mr. Chairman, just to enumerate a few of the pledges that have been made to the people: In the first days of the present administration we were told by gentlemen here, my colleague [Mr. WEAVER] most notably among the number, that now a new era was to begin. Heretofore, we were told, this Government had been run in the interest of men of wealth and the interest of the great monopolies, but now the people were to be considered in all of their interests; and as a proof of this he called our attention to the fact that the President was sympathizing with the settlers upon the frontier who were standing around the Territory of Oklahoma, but who had been kept out by a wicked Republican President; and he assured us that now the monopolists—the cattle barons who had gone into the Territory under the rule of the Republican party—were to be turned out instanter and the settlers were to be at once allowed to go in.

But a few days ago my colleague, with humiliating confession on his lips, was compelled to say to this House that all of those loud-sounding promises and professions were untrue, that the same classes were infesting that Territory now—on the day he spoke—that infested it a year ago, and that the same settlers were still standing upon the outside looking over into the land of promise which the Presidential order kept them from entering, while the cattle syndicates fattened and grew insolent on all that was good in the land.

Again, Mr. Chairman, may it not be possible that the people are fearful that their currency is to be disturbed? My colleague [Mr. WEAVER] aided in the election of this administration, and he told us at that time how we were all to be benefited, how all our people were to be made happy when the administration came into power. He told us that then his pet theories about the enlargement of the volume of currency would be put into operation; that the Democratic party much more completely sympathized with him and his party than did the Republican party. But, instead of that being true, even before the President had taken his seat he terribly disturbed all such prophecies by recommending that the silver element of our currency should be stricken down and that silver coinage should cease.

Not content with that, in the very first report made by his Secretary of the Treasury the Secretary recommended that the greenbacks should be retired, destroying at once nearly six hundred millions of our currency. Then immediately after that, almost upon the very day of the meeting of Congress, in comes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] with a proposition to disturb all the labor interests of the country. No man knows where that will end; no man can tell where this disturbance is to cease; no man can forecast the future or the business operations of the future or his relations to them with the slightest degree of certainty. These gentlemen are content simply to produce change, to produce revolution in finance and in business, and under that fear of change the public mind is disturbed.

The business enterprises of the country can not be carried on without capital. Those who have capital are distrustful of the promises of the majority party and are distrustful of their proposed measures and policies. Men who have money are afraid to embark in business enterprises, knowing that the administration is committed to the destruction of more than one-third of the entire circulation of the country. Others are afraid to engage in manufactures, because the tariff tinkers are abroad in the land. They can not tell when this party of tariff reform are to end their labors, or what manufacturing enterprises are to be stricken down. Hence, from this fear and distrust, the money by the millions of dollars is hoarded, is not permitted to go into use, and as a result business interests, manufacturing interests languish, the fire dies in the furnace and the forge, the factory and the mill is tenantless, while their late occupants are in the streets and the highways, swelling the ranks of the army of tramps that exist in this country to-day, largely because the Democratic party sits in the seat of power, and because the people are so distrustful of the manner in which, and the purposes for which, that power will be used.

Mr. WILLIS. If my friend from Iowa will show that the Muskingum River improvement is responsible for all this, I will move to strike it out of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I said a while ago that the meager improvements of the Muskingum River have but little to do with this matter; but this proposition contained in the paragraph shows to the House and the country the tendency to change the unstable character of this great Democratic party. This Muskingum improvement was begun in 1836; the one for the Monongahela River was begun in the same year; that of the Barren and Green Rivers in 1837; all these works were commenced in the times when the influence of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren was supreme in the councils of the Democratic party of this country and when the Democratic party was everywhere supreme. If there was one dogma of Democracy more certainly Democratic than another in that Jackson-Van Buren period, it was that one denouncing and decrying internal improvements by the General Government—the building of roads, the digging of canals, the improvement of rivers remote from tide water. He who believed the Federal Constitution conferred power upon the Congress to appropriate money for such purposes must cease to be a Jackson Democrat in the days of which I speak. Because of this position on the part of the then Democratic party, these improvements and others were remitted to the States. They must be improved by the States or not be improved at all. And the States were permitted to assume jurisdiction and control over "navigable water ways" and improve them by systems of locks and dams and cheap tolls for their use. Not only so, but later the States sold them out to or gave them away to close corporations for the purpose of individual, personal aggrandizement; and in this way was created the best illustration of complete, perfect, soulless corporations in the whole length and width of the land.

But now the great "unchangeable" Democratic party is undergoing a change—a very radical change. It has provided in this bill for the improvement of rivers remote from tide water, rivers being wholly within one State, for canals wholly within a State, for ice-harbors, for a dry-dock solely for the use of the boats of individuals, and for the purchase of second-hand slackwater improvements, with their canals, infirmities, and water rights. This is a wonderful step for the Democracy, Mr. Chairman, from the doctrines of Jackson to those of a Democratic Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the good year 1886. With such wonderful changes of position on the part of an "unchanging" party can it be wondered that the people have distrust of its purposes and its future?

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on this paragraph is exhausted. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 32, noes 76.

Mr. HEWITT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rules, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HEWITT and Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. HEWITT. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that if he will agree to give us a vote in the House on this question we may save time.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; let us have the question decided now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not see why there should be any objection to allowing the House to express its mind on this question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It will not take so long to have the vote by tellers as to have it by yeas and nays. There is a quorum in the House, and I insist on the count by tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 124.

So the amendment of Mr. REAGAN was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Ohio," in line 875, the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That a joint committee of eight members of this Congress be appointed, to consist of five Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate. Said committee shall confer with a committee of like power appointed by the Legislature of the State of New York, and with the governor and other State officers of said State, in regard to the maintenance of the canals thereof, and ascertain if said canals are sufficient for the requirements of interstate commerce, or if they should be enlarged, and the cost of such enlargement; and said committee shall ascertain upon what terms and conditions the United States can acquire the title to and jurisdiction of said canals, or of any of them. Said committee is authorized to appoint one of its members chairman, and may hold its meetings at such times and places as it may appoint in the State of New York or the city of Washington, and to take testimony and employ a clerk, who shall be a stenographer. The expenses of said committee shall be paid from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress, to be disbursed therefrom upon the order of the chairman of the committee and of two other members, one of whom shall be a Representative and the other a Senator; and said committee shall report in writing to Congress.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I rise to a point of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. The same amendment has been ruled out several times heretofore. It is not germane to the paragraph, and it is not within the jurisdiction of this committee.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that this very amendment was offered yesterday, and after a full discussion was ruled out by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But it was offered to a different paragraph.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That does not make any difference. I presume that the gentleman offers this amendment in good faith——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That being the fact, I simply state to the gentleman, in order to save time, that the same proposition has been already offered and ruled upon.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not desire to consume time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to a single point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The Chair will notice that the sentence beginning at line 858 and closing at line 875, to which this amendment is offered, is a provision to the effect that the Government of the United States hereby accepts from the State of Ohio the Muskingum River improvements. In other words, this amendment is offered to a provision which pertains exclusively and specifically to an improvement of the Muskingum River, which improvement consists of locks, dams, and a canal. Now, I do not offer the amendment to lines 856, 857, and 858. I offer it to the provision in regard to this specific improvement, which is nothing more nor less than an enlarged canal. To that point of the paragraph I offer my amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to point out one distinction between the question as presented to-day and the question upon the same proposition as presented yesterday. As I understood, the amendment was ruled out of order yesterday because there was nothing in the then pending paragraph having reference to canals. Now here is a clause providing that the General Government shall take charge of a certain canal belonging to a State; and there has been read here to-day the act of the Legislature of the State of Ohio providing for the cession of this work. I do not care to go into extended argument on this question, but the Chair must remember very well that this work in the State of Ohio was undertaken by that State at a time when the Democratic party believed that, while Congress had jurisdiction of rivers and harbors, the construction and maintenance of such a work as that now under consideration was not within the constitutional grant of authority to the General Government, and hence must be carried on by State authority. I say I do not care to discuss that point.

I do not care to discuss that question, but here you have a provision before you, Mr. Chairman, which provides for the acceptance of a canal by the General Government. This is as distinctly a canal as the Erie Canal, as the Oswego Canal, or any other canal in the country.

It seems to me the point could hardly be made here in this case that it is not germane to this bill. It does not seem to me the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should have the monopoly of this question of declaring what canals are germane to the river and harbor bill and what canals are not. The chairman of the committee will hardly claim that he can put in this bill one canal and say it is germane to the bill and this whole House can not put in another because it may be said that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment was substantially offered yesterday. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to offer the following amendment, to come in after line 887.

The Clerk read as follows:

For removing the rock shoals in the Fourche, about 4 miles below the town of Perryville, in Perry County, Arkansas, $5,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I had at first thought I would not offer this amendment, but upon more careful consideration of the report made by the engineer, and in view of the fact if this appropriation is made it will be the sole appropriation ever called for in behalf of this work, I have concluded to ask the committee to permit the amendment to be made.

The Fourche River is a tributary of the Arkansas. Up to the shoals, which lie 4 miles south of the town of Perryville, in the State of Arkansas, and which is the largest town on the river, and where the whole commerce is done for the country around, the water is always deep enough at the lowest stage of the river to permit such boats as are suitable to the trade to ascend without difficulty.

Four miles south of Perryville lies this rocky shoal, about 500 feet long. The engineer says that about $21,000 have been expended on this river. No part of it, however, was expended for removing these shoals. It was used for taking out snags and other obstructions. This occurred prior to 1883.

The object of this amendment is to secure an appropriation to remove these rocks so that boats may ascend to the town of Perryville, the principal shipping point on the river. The engineer estimates it will require $5,000 to remove this shoal and give navigation up to Perryville.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman tell us where we will be able to find that estimate?

Mr. ROGERS. I hold it in my hand.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Is it to be found in the Book of Estimates?

Mr. ROGERS. It is not in the Book of Estimates, because I requested the Secretary of War to have this examination made subsequent to the time the report was submitted to Congress. He made it and he made it officially, and his report upon that examination reached the committee through official channels.

I think it ought to be perfectly satisfactory to the committee. If it were the inauguration of a work which would require subsequent appropriations to keep up, I would not ask for it under the present circumstances; but if the engineer's report is true, and we have every reason to believe we can remove 500 feet of this rocky shoal by 50 feet wide with the sum here asked for, I think it ought to be voted. If it required one cent after this appropriation has been had I would not ask for it now. As it makes a permanent improvement to an already navigable river, as it makes navigation possible up to that town, which is the most important point on the river at all seasons except extreme low water, I think the committee might well yield to me this small appropriation I ask for this improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope gentlemen will give me a minute more. Let me say in this connection that I appeal to the committee in all candor and sincerity in favor of the amendment which I have proposed for removing this rocky shoal from the Fourche River.

This point is in the neigborhood of a thriving county town, and there is considerable traffic along the river, while every bale of cotton, every bushel of wheat or corn in that whole section of country, every dollar's worth of produce of all kinds which leaves, or of all merchandise which goes to it, both to and from that town and county, and all that beautiful valley back of it, both above and below, would pass by boats on Fourche River if this improvement were made.

For the want of this improvement all of the produce of that country, except in high water, must be hauled over to the Arkansas River, many miles distant, and ferried across that river, nearly a thousand yards wide, to the railroad, and there it is shipped by rail to Little Rock or Memphis or New Orleans, as the case may be. Mr. Chairman, the ferriage across the Arkansas costs more than the entire cost of the shipment to Little Rock would cost if there was river navigation. This rock shoal is the only impediment. It can be removed for this small sum. It will be a permanent improvement. It is clearly in the power of Congress to make it, and I submit with all possible candor and earnestness that it is meritorious and should be done.

These are the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, and I speak from personal knowledge of the condition and geography of the country; and I say that where the committee can, by expending $5,000 simply, make a permanent improvement which will benefit that one county three times or five times annually the amount of the expenditure it is certainly a proposition which I think the committee will scarcely find ground to object to.

Let me utter one more sentence, then I have done. This is the first moment of the committee's time that I have occupied, and I occupy it in all candor and sincerity to make this appeal to the committee that they will give this little appropriation. I am for this bill and for everything in it that is right; but I think this is one of the things that is eminently right and that the committee should concede it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much having to resist an appeal of this kind made by my friend from Arkansas, but a brief statement of one or two minutes will satisfy him, and I think this committee, that we ought not at this time to take up this river.

We receive these estimates from the local engineers. As a matter of abundant precaution we ask the local engineers to submit them to the Chief of Engineers, and upon his indorsement, when he has considered them, we feel it proper to act.

There are many improvements just like this which have been examined since the general reports of the engineers have been sent in; but as we did not go into others we thought we ought not to go into this one, certainly not until the Chief of Engineers has had an opportunity to pass upon it. I have no doubt that when he does consider the matter he will approve of it; and I only ask the gentleman from Arkansas to bide his time, as we have been appealed to by a hundred other gentlemen for a number of equally worthy improvements in this country, and have been compelled, under the circumstances I have related, to refuse them until these reports are received.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The appropriation proposed by the amendment of my colleague [Mr. ROGERS] is a matter concerning a people I know well and who take a deep interest in having a work, that I know appears small to this House, completed; for it is a work of decided importance to their commerce.

In regard to the point made by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that this has not been submitted to the Chief of Engineers for his approval I wish to state that it does not come up here as a new survey, for in years past $21,000 has been expended to bring this river to its present condition. This amount has been expended through continuous years in removing snags and other obstructions from the channel. Nothing has been done about the shoals below Perryville, though amply reported upon. They prevent the river from being navigable during several months of the important shipping portion of the year. There is then nothing strange about this small but important improvement. It only calls for $5,000 for a permanent work which will effect well-nigh that much saving upon the freight charges of the people in every year to come.

As for the amount of commerce: The amount of commerce is about a quarter of a million of dollars a year. Every dollar of it is foreign and interstate commerce. There are 15,000 bales of cotton that go out of the Fourche La Fave River, every bale of which goes to New England or to Europe. There is a large quantity of cotton-seed which goes out from there, every ton of which is converted into oil at Little Rock, and shipped to the Mediterranean ports; and, as my colleague says, during the heaviest portion of the shipping season these people have to haul their freight many miles across the country, and it is a very heavy charge upon interstate commerce and foreign commerce emanating there.

I believe it is a most reasonable request. While I know it is not advisable and that it is a bad policy generally to break down the conclusions of a committee, yet I unhesitatingly say, as one who has had the honor to once serve upon this committee and is familiar with this river, that in my opinion a mistake was made in overlooking this matter, which is more deserving than any other work now seeking redress at the sovereign hands of the House. My colleague now tells me what I did not know, that the ferriage across the Arkansas River alone where this commerce now seeks the railroad, independent of the expense of hauling to it, costs more than it takes to ship these commodities by boat during the navigable season, which we seek to lengthen, down to Little Rock, where they meet a market that distributes them over the world. Of course the same charge is made upon return freight.

I know, as a matter which should have some weight with this House, that in this Southwestern region, from Red River north and including Southern Missouri, there is a system of rivers flowing into the Mississippi River, and exclusive of that river, with more than 5,000 miles of navigable water; there are in this region, embracing North Louisiana, Northern Texas, Southern Missouri, and Southern Kansas, and all of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, over three million of people, with more than $300,000,000 of commerce. They get only about $200,000 for their commerce, and their rivers need improvement as much as do any rivers in the country. Now, note the contrast. Without instituting any invidious comparison or criticising any appropriation made by the committee, for I believe they are fairly justified in all they have done for other localities, yet while they recommend but little over $200,000 here they give to the commercial system of Oregon, with one-tenth the commerce and population, over $500,000.

Why, sir, if our commerce were treated as liberally as that it would have expended under this bill for the relief of its necessities over $2,000,000; and our necessities are just as great and our improvements are just as constitutional, and our commerce is just as interstate and international. I say this in no harsh spirit of criticism, but only for just and equitable consideration by the House in connection with the humble request which has been made.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact and to correct a misunderstanding that I know the gentleman from Arkansas is under, though not intentionally. There was no report of the Chief of Engineers to the committee on this subject at all. The communication the gentleman refers to was one from the local engineer, addressed to the gentleman from Arkansas himself. In addition to that, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this engineer reports that this inprovement is only necessary in very low water, and that then when the water is low and this improvement is necessary the balance of the river is comparatively dry and navigation is entirely suspended.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to strike out the last two words. I do so simply to correct the statement just made. I will state in the first place that during last summer, through my friend Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, I asked the Secretary of War to have this examination made. It was made, and I hold in my hand now the letter of the Secretary of War, signed officially, transmitting these papers to my friend Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, who sent them to me.

The report was made to the Secretary of War by the local engineer, and by him transmitted through my colleague to me. I suppose, from the nature of the papers before me, this came directly from the Secretary of War to the committee, so that this report is not made to me at all, but is an official communication for the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. The point is that the Chief of Engineers takes these reports and sends them to us with his official approval. When this report comes up in that way it will be in its regular order.

Mr. ROGERS. This is not the place, it seems to me, to make that point; because I introduced a bill and had it sent to the committee, and took copies of these papers in person and laid them before the committee and explained them and the situation, and they should not exclude it now on the ground that they neglected to send for the papers in the proper method. I did all I could do. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Arkansas does not seem to understand my statement. This matter has never been brought before the Chief of Engineers for his approval.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It has been reported by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. WILLIS. Merely by a formal letter of transmittal.

Mr. ROGERS. It is also a mistake of my friend from West Virginia when he says this report is addressed to me. The language on it is:

Indorsements on letter of December 1, 1885, from Hon. J. H. ROGERS respecting the examination of Fourche River, Arkansas, to determine whether shoals thereon can be removed.

There is no address of any letter to me, and it was not sent to me at all. Copies were sent to my colleague and he transmitted them to me, and I laid them before the committee. Certainly the committee did not understand this matter.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. ROGERS, there were—ayes 30, noes 50.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Saint Mary's River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 895, insert after "improvement" the words "by a new lock and dam."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest it is getting late and that the committee ought to rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope, in the public interest, we will go on a little longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Hay Lake Channel, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to have a little information as to this matter.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman certainly understands where Hay Lake Channel is. It is the great throat of the lakes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I know that. My understanding was that there was a channel cut through Hay Lake.

Mr. WILLIS. It is there now, and this is to enlarge it. The draught of vessels passing through that channel is increasing from year to year, decreasing the price of transportation. As the depth of the channel is increased the cost of transportation is diminished. This is for a deepening of that channel.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How much is required to complete the improvement?

Mr. WILLIS. This about completes it—$150,000.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $45,000; of which $22,500 are to be used opposite Bay City.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to amend by striking out, in line 901, the word "opposite" and inserting the word "above."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Fox River, Wisconsin: Continuing improvement below Montelo on the approved plan, $75,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the examination and survey of the Wisconsin River from Portage to the mouth, now being made by a board of engineers, completed as soon as practicable, and a report thereof made on or before the meeting of the next session of Congress.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 907, strike out the word "Montelo" and insert "Montello."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 908 and all thereafter to and including line 913, and insert in lieu thereof as follows, to wit:

"Improving the Wisconsin River from Portage to the mouth, continuing improvement, $100,000; but no part of said last-mentioned sum shall be expended unless, under the direction of the Secretary of War, a board of engineers, on an examination and survey of said river, shall recommend the expenditure thereof, and which expenditure shall not exceed in any event 33⅓ per cent. of the estimates of said engineers of the amount necessary for the improvement of said river for this year.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have recognized the fact that the board of engineers are now making a survey of the Wisconsin River. That board will very shortly make their report, and, if I am correctly informed, it will be favorable to the improvement of the river. This amendment simply proposes that the amount specified may be used in case the engineers make a favorable report and not otherwise, and provides that it shall be 33⅓ per cent. of what they estimate as necessary to be used this year. So, Mr. Chairman, this proposition is exactly upon the plan of the committee, and I can see no possible objection to it. There are a great many rivers proposed to be improved by this bill that do not compare with the Wisconsin.

It is a river from a half to three-quarters of a mile wide, capable of bearing any steamboat that can navigate the Upper Mississippi, and it is connected by canal with the Fox and Wisconsin improvement, so that direct communication between the Mississippi and the great lakes can be had cheaper by that than by any other route. Rafts amounting to 1,100,000 feet have come out of the Wisconsin and floated down to New Orleans; the greatest raft that ever arrived in New Orleans went from the Wisconsin in 1876. There are a few bars in the river, a few places that need improvement in order that vessels may ascend. That improvement is necessary, and I hope the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will take this into consideration and accept this amendment, in view of the fact that I have embodied in it provisions that cover every contingency, so that there can be no possible danger in its adoption.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend will see the propriety of not pressing this amendment. We have called for a report of the board of engineers. The gentleman now proposes to take that report, and upon their estimate, no matter what it may be, make an appropriation. The usual way is for the enginners to report to Congress, so that we may know just what they have done and what they recommend. I submit to him that his improvement is in progress of favorable consideration. The board of engineers has been convened to consider the problem of improving that river, and until the board makes its report no appropriation should be made.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I notice that there is $1,800,000 proposed to be appropriated in this bill for objects that are not in the books of estimates. Why does the committee make a distinction against the Wisconsin River, a river which is well known throughout the country, which is known to be a navigable stream, and an important link in the connection between the Mississippi and the great lakes?

Mr. WILLIS. My friend is entirely mistaken in his proposition, so that I do not think it necessary to reply to it. We have not recommended appropriations that the engineers have not asked for. In this particular instance the Chief of Engineers says that we ought not to expend any money until the board of engineers has made an examination and determined whether the improvement is advisable.

The amendment was rejected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that there is no quorum present, and I suggest that the committee ought to rise.

Mr. WILLIS. There is nothing in the next two pages of the bill that will excite any objection, and I hope the committee will go on for some time longer. We have made but little progress to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois: Continuing work on lock and dams at Grand Rapids and on the river from Grand Rapids to its mouth, $80,000; of which $12,000 to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment which I propose to offer to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Illinois," in line 920, the following: "And the further sum of $50,000, to be expended between the Grand Rapids and the city of Attica, Ind."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the Wabash River has long been recognized as an important stream. There have been some small improvements made upon it, and it is proposed now to expend $80,000 upon the river. Most, or all, of that amount is to be expended where the river forms the boundary line between Indiana and Illinois, cutting off the portion of the river which is in the State of Indiana. There are now several boats upon that part of it, plying between Attica, Terre Haute, and Vincennes, and I merely ask that this amount be appropriated to improve the navigation there.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have followed strictly the report of the engineers in this case, which recommends that there be no appropriation for this river above the Grand Rapids until the improvement there was completed. That is the reason that none was reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the only reason.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment to this paragraph, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Illinois," in line 920, the following: "And the further sum of $25,000 shall be expended between the Grand Rapids and the city of Terre Haute, Ind."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] makes the point that the committee have followed the recommendation of the engineers. Terre Haute is the best city upon the Wabash River. It is a city of 30,000 inhabitants, with more manufactures, more commerce, and more business than any other city upon the river from its source to its mouth.

I do not see any force in the proposition that this river, so important to our commerce, should be compelled to wait for its improvement until the Grand Rapids can be cleaned out. There are to-day five or six boats on that river which are hauling the commerce between Terre Haute and Vincennes, yet of the amount appropriated in this paragraph $12,000 are to be expended at a little town called Grayville, in the State of Illinois, in order to straighten the channel and keep it from leaving the little town upon dry land, and the remaining $68,000 are to be expended upon the Grand Rapids and on the river from that point to its mouth, leaving the city of Terre Haute, with more commerce than all the other cities upon the river, without any appropriation at all, and compelling a section of farming country the finest in the West to ship its grain by rail, when with an appropriation of $25,000 at that point the river, after this appropriation of $80,000 shall have been expended, will be open from Terre Haute to the Ohio. I insist in all candor upon this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to my friend from Indiana that the reason the committee did not allow the appropriation he proposes was that it was not asked for by the engineers. The engineers stated to us that the first improvement to be made there was upon this work on the lock and dams; that until this was done no further improvement should be made. We did report in favor of the expenditure of $12,000 at Grayville, because the engineer asked it. We follow the engineers, so far as we can, whenever they give us proper information on these points.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then, if I understand the gentleman aright, we had better relieve the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from any further labor and let the engineers attend to this whole business. I am here asking this appropriation. If the committee is to be controlled by the estimate of the engineer, thus setting up a "one-man power," what is the use of having thirteen or fifteen men appointed as a committee to look after the interests of the people in these matters?

Mr. WILLIS. I am ready to submit the question to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I wish to make a single remark. The gentleman from Indiana speaks of the city of Terre Haute, with its population of 30,000 and its commerce. I wish to say to him that Terre Haute and its people are more interested in this improvement at Grand Rapids than in any other that can be made on that river.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, there were—ayes 30, noes 47.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, and Mr. BEACH. No quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or lake), at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Stillwater, Minn.; and

A bill (H. R. 7651) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River near or in the vicinity of Chamberlain, in the Territory of Dakota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1101) to provide for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Round Valley reservation, in the State of California, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILLIS (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKINSON: Petition of Grange No. 773, of Juniata County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of a law to suppress imitation dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of same, protesting against the admission of foreign agricultural products free of duty—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BARBOUR: Papers relating to the claim of Freeman & Richardson—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BARKSDALE: Petition of Dr. W. P. Hughes and others, physicians, of Claiborne County, Mississippi, for appropriations to be used by the National Board of Health to prevent the introduction of infectious diseases into the United States and to protect the public health—to the Committee on Appropiations.

By Mr. BUCHANAN: Petition of Grange No. 8, of New Jersey, for the suppression of the manufacture and sale of all imitation dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of same, against the admission, free of duty, of all agricultural raw materials, such as wool, hides, &c.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BUNNELL: Petitions of Granges Nos. 74 of Susquehanna County, 126, 153, 182, and 336 of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, praying for a law to protect them from the adulteration of food, especially butter—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the same, protesting against a reduction of the tariff on wool, hides, rice, tobacco, jute, raw sugars, &c.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of James Sturdevant and 10 affidavits to accompany House bill granting said James Sturdevant a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURROWS: Petition in favor of woman suffrage—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: Petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, against the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at Cairo—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. J. M. CAMPBELL: Petition of Grange No. 791, of Pennsylvania, asking for such legislation as will suppress the manufacture and sale of all imitation dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of same, asking that the proposed tariff bill be amended so as to afford wool and other agricultural products the same protection that is accorded to other industries—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial of Traders and Travelers' Union, for the passage of H. R. 1621—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of Henry S. Eckert, president of Farmers' National Bank, of Reading, Pa., for issuance of national banking bonds—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. EVERHART: Memorial of Grange No. 114, Patrons of Husbandry, asking for a law against the sale of imitation dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NEW MEXICO LAND CLAIM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting reports of the former surveyor-general and the present surveyor-general of New Mexico in the matter of the alleged private land claim in that Territory designated as the Santa Tomas de Yturbide colony claim, No. 139; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4629) for the relief of Levi Jones was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FLORIDA LANDS—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter from Mr. L. L. Bristow, of Lakeland, Fla., a gentleman of character and influence and a lawyer of reputation and capacity, in the nature of a petition relating to legislation required with reference to public lands of the United States in the State of Florida. Mr. Bristow states that in the event of the land not being forfeited the settlers will be at the mercy of the railroad corporation, and while the settlers are afraid to petition Congress for their homes that the company have employed Judge White, late State land commissioner, to go throughout South Florida in the region of this grant and circulate petitions asking for an extension for twelve months longer. [See appendix for letter.]

I move the reference of this paper to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Before I take my seat, in connection with this subject I desire as a matter of personal privilege to make reference to a statement alleged to have been made by the receiver of the United States court in Jacksonville, Fla., of the insolvent corporation which claims this grant and protests against its forfeiture. In reference to a speech recently made by me in the Senate of the United States urging the passage of a bill for the forfeiture of this grant, with a clause for the protection of actual settlers to the extent of 160 acres of land, and that the remainder should be open to homestead entry by citizens of the United States, the Jacksonville Morning News of 23d April, published at Jacksonville, Fla., contains an alleged interview with Mr. Duval, the receiver, which I now read. [See appendix for article.]

The cause for this attack of Senator CALL could only be interpreted in one way. It was not State patriotism, for the honorable gentleman must know that it was not beneficial to a State or its people to place everything at the mercy of any one corporation. This was precisely what Senator CALL would do, as, if the Florida Railway and Navigation Company was shut out of further extensions in South Florida, it left the people of that country at the mercy of the Plant system, and they could keep up or fix any rate they chose.

It was the appearance of surveyors and workmen in the field, commencing a line

thus attacking the Savannah, Florida and Western and the Plant syndicate in their stronghold and making them feel that their monopoly would soon be ended, that brought about this latter attack, and of this fact Mr. Duval was certain.

Mr. Duval thinks that it is solely to the necessities of the Plant syndicate that the action of the Senator can be attributed. He was certain that that syndicate was at the back of the whole of it. He knew from a citizen that Senator CALL had said that he must pursue this line of action, as he had no money and needed it. When Mr. CALL left here he was in now he was building a fine residence in Washington. This was plain sailing for posted ones. There could be only one construction put upon the matter.

But Mr. Duval did not propose to say a great deal about the matter. He who handles pitch must become defiled. Any one could take up the State papers from all points where his road ran, and read expressions of good-will and hopes for the road, also the items concerning the improvements of all sorts, such as laying of steel rails, new side tracks, depots, &c., all tending to build up a country. These were in direct opposition to the actions of Senator CALL, which were calculated to injure, not benefit, a State.

Mr. President, I desire to say in my place in the Senate that this statement, so far as it relates to me personally, is an absolute falsehood, a foul slander, and if it emanates, as it is alleged to do, from an officer of the United States court it deserves the consideration of the Senate as to how far the courts of the United States may be allowed to permit their officers falsely, maliciously, wickedly, without any ground or pretense of reason or truth, to circulate libelous and false statements in regard to Senators performing their official duty here. If the law of criminal libel within the limits of a State does not adequately cover such cases there should be some means by which the courts of the United States shall be prevented from allowing such false and malicious libels as this alleged interview contains and for the prompt dismissal of such persons as may be guilty of them. I hope this alleged interview is not true. I treated this receiver as an honorable man and a gentleman in my remarks a few days since. I should regret to think that any man claiming any degree of respect or consideration could be guilty of such an infamous act.

To the end that this foul charge and its authors may be exposed to the contempt of all honest and truthful persons I make this statement of facts:

I am not building a fine residence in Washington; and in order that the fact may be known in all places where this false and foul libel which has been perpetrated on me will reach, I desire to say that for many years a person standing in a near relation to me has had property in the hands of a trustee, Hon. James M. Baker, judge of the circuit court and formerly of the supreme court of the State of Florida, who, with his successor in that trust, has decided to change an investment of a portion of that property into a modest residence in Washington. This trustee in whom the title is and his successor, and Mr. D. G. Ambler, the president of the national bank in Jacksonville, and a distinguished attorney of that bar, Mr. J. J. Daniels, and an associate, are the persons who have been engaged in this transaction, with which I have no other connection than this, and the newspapers here, without knowledge of the facts, have used my name in connection with that transaction; and out of it this false and wicked libel has been perpetrated.

I had rather be a dog and bay the moon than to be guilty of a false and criminal libel such as this against any person.

It is because I protest against the confirmation of 575,000 acres of land to an insolvent corporation standing in the courts confessing its insolvency and testifying that $5,000,000 have been borrowed upon its property within the last five or six years and not one dollar of it applied toward the renewal of the iron rails which have been there for thirty years, and no considerable part of it applied to the extension of the road to its terminal points as required by the charter, without one solitary word of evidence in the record to show that this is an honest incumbrance or an honest debt. It is because the courts have neglected and the State authorities have neglected to have justice done to the people by the completion of this road to its terminal points. It is because I stand here to-day in the name of the settlers and the people of the State, let the influences be what they may, to demand that the 575,000 acres of the remaining portion of the public lands of the State, constituting nearly all that is valuable, now penetrated by railroads upon every side, while for thirty years this insolvent corporation has stood by without prosecuting to completion the enterprise, shall pass in homesteads of 160 acres to actual settlers and occupants. It is because I insist that when receivers are appointed by courts of the United States of great railroad properties in States they shall appoint them from citizens of the States where the property is situated. It is because I insist that by law the courts of the United States shall be compelled to apply the earnings of railroads to the payment of their domestic creditors and the people whom they employ and to the completion of the railroad as required by its charter that I am thus vilely slandered.

I take this occasion to say that if motives, and corrupt motives, are to be attributed, they belong to those who attack me and not to me. It is a stupid pretense to assert that any parties proposing to build a line of road from Millen to Jesup in Georgia, will be stopped or hindered because the Congress of the United States prefers to carry out the policy of the homestead law and give the land to actual settlers rather than to give it to rich men who live abroad and expend its proceeds in a luxury foreign to our institutions and our character, who have grown rich in the construction of railroads out of the proceeds of the public lands granted by Congress. It is idle and unreasonable to assert that the building of a railroad from Millen to Jesup will be dependent on or in any way affected by the solvency or insolvency of this corporation.

Are we supposed to be men of any sense or intelligence when we are told that a great line of railroad, being insolvent and sold out, will not be bought by those who have means to do it, and that its purchase price will not be measured by its value, its resources, and that when bought it will not be bought subject to the condition and obligation of its completion to Tampa, failing to do which it will be at all times subject to forfeiture by the State? Who will deny that this is the law, obligatory on all courts and judges and State officers, and needing only that the people's rights shall be protected by those whom they charge with this trust?

How unreasonable and even how absurd it is that such pretenses should be made, not in any interest of the city of Jacksonville and of the people of the State, but simply to vest the title in a few rich men, who live out of the State, of a half million acres of the public lands of the United States which belong to the people, which by act of Congress, by the established policy of the Government, by the pledge of both political parties, have been given to the people for actual settlement and cultivation in quantities of 160 acres.

We are told in this alleged interview that the interests of the prosperous and attractive city of Jacksonville, and of the State of Florida, with all her resources and the qualities which have enticed into her limits a most intelligent, active, and progressive people, are inseparably bound up in enriching a few men who, by at least doubtful methods, have become the owners of the stock of an insolvent corporation, which for thirty years, since 1855–'56, has been under a charter obligation to build this road to Tampa, and for thirty years has failed to comply with its charter contract and with the highest and chief obligation of its charter.

How absurd, in the knowledge of any lawyer in the Senate, the pretense that there is no other way to compel a corporation, whether solvent or insolvent, to carry out its contract with the people by the completion of its line to its terminal point after it has built over 260 miles of road with gratuities from the State and the United States, than for the Congress of the United States to give them the homes of the settlers on the public lands of the United States and the power to compel the people to pay them three or four prices beyond its market value for their homes. Especially how far beyond the power of language to describe, in its manifest error and unreasonableness, is it to allege that a railroad property which by the sworn statement of this receiver and the trustee of this property has been able to incur a debt of between four and five millions of dollars, on a property which was sold for $320,000 in 1869, and on which not a single new iron rail has been placed, as is stated on his oath by the receiver, a property on which by the records of this court a million and a half of dollars has been borrowed in the last four months; a property which the receiver certifies will produce an income sufficient to pay the interest on several millions of dollars of bonds, requires aid from the United States to build its road 50 or 75 miles to completion.

Is not the law plain and known to every one that he who acquires an interest in a corporate property does it with knowledge that all his money, whether bonds or stocks, depends for its very existence as property on the road's completion according to the terms of its charter?

I have no doubt that the earnings of this road in any six months faithfully applied to the payment of its operating expenses and the construction of this line of railroad will complete it to Tampa. I have no doubt that proceedings of forfeiture for non-completion in a reasonable time and for a failure to apply its earnings to its completion to Tampa will result in its immediate completion.

There is no business man of intelligence in this country who does not know that there is no difficulty in obtaining the means to complete this road and put it in order.

Whether the persons, if there be any, who have purchased this property and paid their money for the unsubstantial and unlawful claims of their predecessors shall make or lose money is another question.

Whether the people of the United States shall pay the possible loss of their speculation out of the taxes imposed on the people is another question.

Whether the Congress of the United States shall so legislate that the actual settlers—men, women, and children of Florida—on the land of this grant shall be compelled to pay for their speculation and make it good by being required to purchase this land at $2.50 an acre or more is still another question. I am not in favor of making the poor people of this country who cultivate the soil pay such a price for their lands as will pay for the construction of a railroad, and then give it away, with power to tax the people at will for transportation.

I am not in favor of making land grants to build railroads after a country has become occupied and other lines of railroads have been built through it, and after the lands have become valuable, and after it has, by delay and the misapplication of its earnings, neglected and failed to comply with the conditions of the organic law.

If these opinions subject me to censure as an unfaithful public servant, I must abide that censure. But I am not unwilling to treat corporations with liberality—to give them aid in all proper cases, to protect their rights, and to compel them by law to perform their duty to the people. I am as eager to promote the prosperity and welfare of the people of Florida, whether new-comers or of long residence, as any one can be. I have no interest in any railroad company, and no connection with any. I desire to deal justly and fairly with all, so far as I can do so consistently with the rights and interests of the great body of the people of the State.

[After the delivery of this speech this morning I received the following dispatch from Mr. Duval, the receiver. I am glad to receive the statement from him that he has no connection with the infamous libel to which I have referred in my remarks. I have not seen the article in the Times-Union to which he refers. The dispatch is as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 28, 1886.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to your remarks in the Senate to-day upon an article in the Jacksonville News of April 23, reported as an interview with me, I disclaim all responsibility for the statements contained in that article, and so far as I am concerned I distinctly state that the article was false in all its statements and so improbable as representing my language that I have not considered it heretofore worthy of my notice. What I have desired to say to the public upon the issue you forced upon me in your late speeches has been said over my own signature in the Times-Union of April 27.

H. R. DUVAL.]

Since the receipt of the telegram from Mr. Duval, the receiver, I have received the following telegram from Mr. John P. Varnum, editor of the Jacksonville News:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 29.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL:

I am informed that Mr. H. R. Duval has telegraphed to you denying the correctness of interview in News of 23d. I stand ready to establish entire correctness of that interview by abundant evidence.

JOHN P. VARNUM.

I leave this matter to be settled between these persons. I have also received and read the communication of Mr. Duval, the receiver of the United States court, in the Times-Union of the 27th instant, in which, in headlines, between the paragraphs, with a self-assurance which loses nothing from modesty, is inserted "Call excoriated." The communication alludes to me as "demagogical," denies the statements of fact in my speech, defends his appointment as receiver because he fought with the Florida troops in Virginia during the war between the States, undertakes to champion the courts of the United States, insists that I know nothing of the Constitution, which he claims to understand thoroughly, asserts that I am a States-right man in the sense of opposing the introduction of new men into the State and recognizing their right to be equal to any others.

Its statements, so far as they relate to me, are equally false, and but little less slanderous, than the interview before referred to. Receiver Duval says that I attacked him personally. This is not true. I referred to the importation of a receiver from another State as a judicial act that should be prohibited by law. There is not a word in my speech that is not respectful to him. I said of him: I am informed that this receiver is a man of character and unconnected with claimants; that he is improving the property.

I have never seen Mr. Duval. I do not know him and never heard of him until his appointment, nor since except through the newspapers and their telegrams. I did not, therefore, know anything to attack him about. I read Dr. Stringer's letter making a statement that persons circulating the petition against forfeiture and granting patents to actual settlers had stated that the receiver would take up the iron from the road if Congress should forfeit the grant. This was Dr. Stringer's statement and not mine. I have stated that Dr. Stringer was a highly honorable and truthful gentleman, but this was no attack on Receiver Duval.

It is therefore evident that his statement is not true, but is a mere pretense for an attack on me—not for his own vindication, but in the interests of his employers—against the forfeiture of railroad grants. I accept it as such.

Receiver Duval makes two personal attacks on me A stranger to me and mine, he invades the privacy of my family relations, and with rude and sacrilegious hand enters the sacred precincts of the grave and invokes in his unholy purposes the presence and memory of a brother who was dearer to me than any other person, and whose character I admire and respect more than any man I ever knew.

A whole generation of such men as Receiver Duval and his associates have proven themselves to be would not make one such man in the nobility of his nature, in his sympathy with the rights of the people, with justice and truth, and in the splendid intellect with which he was gifted. It is not true that to the day of his death he was in association with the persons named, or that he had any connection with any of their proceedings after the sale and transfer of his interest in the old Florida Railroad. His relation to this railroad and its organization in its first years it is unnecessary to mention. It is sufficient to say that Receiver Duval knows nothing of them, and that they were always honorable and generous and truthful, and that it was to his great intellect and wonderful capacity for labor, and the universal respect and affection and confidence of the people of Florida in him that its construction was chiefly due. Had he lived there would have been no Receiver Duval nor the claims he represents.

It is false in every respect that my position with this road or any of its lines has ever been equivocal. I have never had any relation to the Florida Railroad of any kind. I have, as a lawyer, brought suits against it to compel those who unlawfully and unjustly had acquired possession of it to pay their just debts and obligations which they have so far refused and failed to do. The receiver no doubt regards this an equivocal position, but he can not truthfully state any other relation which I have ever occupied to the Florida Railroad Company.

My speech in the Senate contains not one word of denunciation of Mr. Yulee and Dickerson.

It contains extracts from the sworn testimoney of Mr. Yulee and Finigan in relation to certain facts. I made no statement but such as is proved by their testimony. Facts, truth, no doubt is a denunciation to Mr. Duval and his schemers.

Mr. Duval's attack on me in reference to the Dibble purchase of 1869 is equally false in its insinuations and imputations.

The purchase of the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad in 1869 was made at open public sale. It was made under a written agreement, still extant, to protect the original stockholders and the State and to defeat the purposes of the sale. It was for an honest, just, and useful purpose. I was one of the persons who entered into the agreement to make it. These persons were Hon. James M. Baker, one of the most honorable, upright citizens the State has ever had.

Before that time a judge of the supreme court, a senator of the Confederate States twice elected, since a judge of the circuit court, Silas L. Niblack, a prominent and honorable citizen of the State, Alonzo Huling, a wealthy and reputable citizen of Jacksonville, Mr. Requa, a man of some fortune, Franklin Dibble, at this time a banker and commission merchant of established credit and means, E. M. Cheney, then United States district attorney. These persons were sustained by Dibble, Worth & Co., then a New York commission house of credit and ample means, who agreed with Franklin Dibble to accept his draft and furnish the money to pay the deposit, and negotiate their securities for the balance if the title under the purchase should be sustained by the court.

When the purchase was made Mr. Swepson held the bonds of the road, accepted the draft of Dibble, Worth & Co. in payment of the deposit money, which draft afterward was arranged between them and became the subject of litigation.

Judge Baker and myself brought suit to prevent the transfer of the purchase to Swepsen and Littlefield and were defeated, and our connection with the matter ended with this suit. We had nothing to do with any of their arrangements or transactions. I defy Mr. Receiver Duval to make anything out of this to my injury. He certainly can not frighten me by his threats from doing all in my power to prevent the Government of the United States from placing the settlers on the public lands in his power and compelling them to pay for the construction of his railroad to Tampa under the stupid pretenses of this communication.

Mr. Duval, the receiver, says he will publish this history. Its later developments will be congenial to his present purpose and associates. They entailed a great debt on the people of the State to be paid by the tax-payers in exorbitant freight and transportation under the like false pretenses with those which he is now engaged in of bringing money in the State in return for watered stock and a fictitious bonded indebtedness to be paid in interest charges by the people of the State. There is not a paragraph in this statement of Receiver Duval which does not contain an untruth.

I stated in my speech that, taking the statements as they were found in Mr. Duval's evidence which I printed, four or five millions of indebtedness had been accumulated on the properties known as the old Florida Railroad Company in denial of the rights of domestic creditors.

This statement did not purport to be accurate as to amount, but only proximate.

The "old Florida Railroad" is from Fernandina to Cedar Key, and from Waldo to Panasoffkee.

The trustee's sworn statement is as follows:

Bonds of 10th May	$1,000,000
First consolidated mortgage bonds	3,782,000
Peninsular Railroad Company	250,000
Florida, Central and Western Railroad Company	2,808,000
Fernandina and Jacksonville Railroad Company	350,000
Aggregate exceeds	8,190,000
Floating debt	1,600,000
Tr. Bayard Cutting	100,000
	18,080,000
Annual interest charges	465,000

I published this statement with my remarks on the forfeiture bill, to show that a bonded indebtedness with power of sale in the hands of a trustee is under the decision of the courts a "denial of the rights of domestic creditors," as the reports of the United States courts denying the rights of domestic creditors in such cases will fully establish. Why does Mr. Duval deny this statement and say the old Florida Railroad has on it a bonded debt of $1,000,000. Will he have us believe that of this $18,080,000 of debt the Florida Railroad from Fernandina to Cedar Keys and Waldo to Pansakoffkee bears only $10,000,000.

Where has the money for the bonds which the trustee, Myer, refers to gone? This was the denial of the rights of domestic creditors to which I referred. This Mr. Duval, under the pressure of these proceedings in Congress for the forfeiture of this grant, has for the first time, as he himself swore in his evidence published in my speech, since the road was built, applied any money to renewing the iron on the road; that he has himself stated in this article that he has paid "$206,000 to citizens of Florida for back wages, fuel, ties, and other supplies, cattle claims, &c.," proves the truth of the statement in my speech that this bonded indebtedness is a denial of the rights of domestic creditors; that the issue of receiver's certificates, which if they have any validity at all, which is very doubtful, are a prior right and lien, and will cut off all domestic creditors, and are so intended, and will leave them subject to the caprice of a receiver and his employés, every well-informed person knows, and it is to be presumed that Mr. Duval knows it.

It is easy to see that these payments now for the first time made for the repair of this property are forced by the proceedings pending in Congress for the forfeiture of this grant.

I print in an appendix hereto a letter from a distinguished lawyer and gentleman of Florida, whose name I withhold because he apprehends injury to him and his friends from the influence of Mr. Receiver Duval in matters connected with this road.

I also print in an appendix another letter from a worthy citizen of Alachua County, Florida, whose name I withhold for the same reasons.

I know that I am taking on myself a great task in refusing to submit to the demands of the receiver of this corporation in the hands of the United States court with a million and a half of dollars, raised by the pledge of extortionate taxes in freight and transportation to be expended at his pleasure; that a million and a half of dollars shall be paid by the poor settlers on the public lands of the United States for the benefit of his employers.

I take this responsibility. I abhor such practices and such false pretenses. The demand for this grant is the most unreasonable that was ever made. In all the bold spoliations of the public domain there is none to equal this, and none the false pretenses of which are so bold and barefaced.

Receiver Duval claims that it is a great boon to the State, for which our people ought to be under profound gratitude to him, that the railroads built with the people's money and the people's lands and the people's school fund should be burdened with four or five millions of dollars of bonds for the benefit of those whose debts have been paid by the State with the people's money, the proceeds of sale of the people's lands; and with immense grants of the land itself He demands that the people of the State shall forever be burdened and taxed with the increased cost of transportation on their own railways by the fixed charges of interest to be paid by them on this watered stock and fictitious debt created without consideration or value.

To expose and prevent this was the force and effect of my argument in my speech on this part of the subject. The receiver's reply to it is such as might have been expected from the appointee of those who hold these watered and fictitious securities which are sought to be made good through the United States court in a perpetual burden and increase of the costs and rates of transportation to be imposed on the people of the State of Florida. At the very moment when the committees of both Houses of Congress under the pressure of a universal demand of the people of the United States have reported favorably the bill for regulating interstate commerce with the stern hand of the law, to prevent the oppressive exactions of watered stock and fictitious securities of railroad corporations by excessive rates of transportation, when the House of Representatives has repeatedly passed the bill, when the Senate is about to pass it, Mr. Receiver Duval, of the United States court, makes his advent in the State as the apostle and advocate and representative of proceedings to fix on our people the perpetual burden of a tax of $20,000,000 for a railroad and franchise which in 1866-'69 sold for $1,800,000 with about one hundred and forty miles of new road on transportation to sustain these fictitious railroad securities and pay the interest on them to their holders; and with an audacity equal to the interest of those who hold them, demands that Congress, representing all the people of the United States, shall give him $1,500,000 worth of public lands and the right to exact of the settlers, the citizens of the United States, from $3 to $4 an acre and as much more as they please to enable him to impose these perpetual burdens on the people.

If Mr. Receiver Duval is not better acquainted with the practical duties of a receiver of a railroad than he is with sound argument, with the great public policies on which transportation and money invested in railroads must be and will be regulated by law, even the confidence and recommendations of the creditors, who, he says, are the stockholders and owners of this watered and unlawful indebtedness, will not make him a fit and proper person for so great and important a trust. Nor will his selection or appointment by one or two or more judges of the courts of the United States enable him or them to resist the public law and the public policy with which the united voice of the American people of all parties and of every State demand that the lines of railroad shall no longer be burdened with watered and excessive debts, the fixed charges of which are to be imposed on the people who travel and send freight over such lines.

The fraud of the imposition of a great bonded indebtedness on a line of road already built to be paid by the people of the State in transportation charges, which Mr. Receiver Duval relies on his arraignment of me is an exploded one. It can not be revived anywhere, and in attempting it in Florida he will be met by that intelligent body of Northern men who did not fight with him in Virginia and that intelligent body of Southern men who did fight with him in Virginia (as he says), both now happily united in the great object of cheapening transportation by regulations established by law; of prohibiting the imposition of fraudulent and fictitious securities on lines of railroads; of prohibiting donations of the public lands for the construction of railroads in countries long settled, where the lands have become valuable from the enterprise of others—united in the great object of compelling the courts and all others to enforce the faithful and honest performance of the obligations of its charter by any railroad company, to complete its line of railroad before they apply its earnings for their personal use and benefit.

They are united in the further object of requiring such laws to be made by Congress as will forbid the judges of the United States courts from appointing receivers outside of the jurisdiction of the State and Federal judicial district at the suggestion or dictation of the owners of alleged bonds and securities, without evidence and inquiry as to the bona fides of such stock and securities, they are united in the demand that a million and a half of dollars shall not be borrowed in the inception of such proceedings on the property of an insolvent corporation without requiring any part of it to be expended in the completion of the road to its terminal point until the United States shall agree to build it for them by imposing, in addition to the fixed charges of its bonded indebtedness, an increase of two or three times the price of their homes to the people on the public lands.

The statements of this communication of Mr. Receiver Duval are pretenses, unreasonable and untrue. They are old stories, which are told every day by those who seek to appropriate the public money and the public land to make individuals rich and the people poor. The people of the United States have passed judgment on them and forever condemned them. The examples of the Pacific railroads, built with the people's money and with empires of the public lands, with their extortionate rates of fare, with their stock and bonds in the hands of a few individuals who have accumulated by the use of the people's money and property fortunes greater than any potentate in Europe—railroads bonded with vast amounts of debts far beyond the just and economic necessities of construction—have awakened the American people to the necessity of requiring great managers of credit to give an honest consideration for the public franchises which are granted to them.

Thirty years ago the United States made land grants to the State under which she has acquired more than 20,000,000 of the 35,000,000 acres of land in the State.

How does the account of the people of Florida stand with the persons whom Mr. Duval represents—the stockholders and bondholders whom he says own the road, and loan themselves the money to put their own property in repair the first time for twenty-five years?

The account then stands about as follows:

	Acres.
The Florida Railroad Company, State lands	360,000
The Florida Railroad Company, United States land (about)	300,000
Pensacola and Georgia and Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Coast Company, State lands	800,000
	1,460,000
Pensacola and Georgia and Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Coast Company, United States land (about)	600,000
Total	2,000,000

Money:
County stock of Pensacola and Georgia Railroad and Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Coast Railroad	$460,000
Private stock (about)	400,000
Internal improvement stock paid up (about)	100,000
Florida Railroad:
No private stock paid up.
No county stock.
Internal improvement stock paid up	90,000
Money paid, Vose debt	1,000,000
Total	2,050 000

This is approximately correct. State school fund, I do not know how much. What have they done in return for this money? Mr. Duval answers on oath as follows:

I found upon taking the property into my charge its condition to be one of exceeding dilapidation; its road-bed in bad order; its ties and structure in like bad condition, and much of its rail, which is iron, rotten, a large portion of it having been in use from fifteen to twenty-five years; its sidings totally inadequate, its switches primitive and dilapidated, and the road-bed and track being in such a condition of decay that it is impossible to conduct its service without excessive cost and constant danger to the lives of its passengers and employés, and danger of loss and destruction to its property, rolling-stock and motive-power, and merchandise which it undertakes to transport. No regularity in service can be maintained or proper dispatch given to passengers, mails, or freights. Its motive-power, which consists of forty engines of all ages and patterns, one-third of which is totally unfit for service, and the balance of which needs repairs to a greater or less extent, which the road does not possess shops or materials to make or means to provide for, is therefore totally inadequate for the purpose.

* * * * * * *

The lack of traffic earnings by the property has not in my judgment been the occasion of its depletion in the past few years. The books of the company show earnings annually of about $1,000,000 gross, and its operating expenses, if the road was put in proper condition, should not exceed 65 per cent. of this amount annually.

Mr. Meyer, the trustee, answers as follows:

Your orator further shows unto your honors that the consolidated defendant railway company is insolvent, and that it has no funds to pay the amount of said interest in arrears; that besides its liability upon its bonds secured by the said deed of trust dated May 10, 1881, amounting to $1,000,000, it is further liable to pay its so-called first consolidated mortgage bonds, amounting in the aggregate to $3,782,000, and is also liable to pay other bonds secured by several other mortgages upon different parts and sections of its line of railroad and railroad property, which, before the consolidation of the said constituent corporations into the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, belonging to them respectively, that is to say: Upon the line of railroad theretofore belonging to the Peninsular Railroad of Florida it is liable to pay mortgage liens amounting to $250,000; upon the line of railroad theretofore belonging to the Florida Central and Western Railroad Company it is liable to pay mortgage liens amounting to the sum of $2,808,000; upon a line of railroad theretofore belonging to the Fernandina and Jacksonville Railroad Company it is liable to pay mortgage liens amounting to the sum of $350,000; that the aggregate of all said bonded indebtedness is upward of $8,190,000.

The people, then, have lost their money, lost their school fund, and have, as the result, railroads run down, with old iron and worn-out locomotives and equipment, for the use of which they have been paying an annual tax of $1,000,000; burdened with twenty millions of indebtedness, for which no honest consideration has been given, held by Mr. Duval's friends, the interest on which the people of the State must pay.

He now asks that Congress shall by law subject the settlers on the public lands of the United States to a forced payment of about $2,000,000 as the condition of building the railroad to Tampa, about 50 miles, as required by the charter, and give him a perpetual and unlimited right to tax them at will for transportation. He says that if Congress does not grant this most unreasonable demand, I will be the cause of the road's not being completed to Tampa; and because Congress has not already granted this request, I am to blame.

This demand of Mr. Duval means that in every poor man's family the money that should go to educate his children shall be paid to Mr. Duval's employers. It means poorer clothing, poorer comforts, and more of sorrow, hardship, and suffering in every family along the pretended (?) consolidated roads in Gadsden, Leon, Wakulla, Jefferson, Madison, Suwannee, Columbia, Baker, Duval, Nassau, Bradford Alachua, Marion, Sumter, Hernando, Polk, and Hillsborough Counties.

Receiver Duval says:

There were among its owners capitalists * * * who were willing and able to contribute the required money (a million dollars) immediately, "but with the several suits pending against its title no sufficient security could be offered for the funds."

Again he says:

In this case * * * the creditors being the owners.

Mr. Duval, therefore, testifies that the creditors who hold the $18,080,000 of indebtedness and bonds are also the owners of the property, of the stock of the corporation. They want a receiver of the United States court to protect their own property against themselves.

Mr. Duval asks, "Was ever receiver placed in a position so thoroughly representative of the owners of the property?" To which I reply that never before. Mr. Duval was there a receiver appointed by a court to protect property against its owners on the application of the owners as creditors; and that never before was the creditor complainant allowed to sue himself as his own debtor for the purpose of securing himself the money which he proposed to lend himself; and rarely has he been allowed to appoint his own receiver, and bring him from another State to place him in charge of the franchises and property of a corporation created under the laws of that State.

Does any one believe that $20,000,000 of debt has been honestly created on this property which, excepting the 99 miles to Tavares and the 23 miles to Panasoffkee, cost the purchasers in 1866–'69 $1,800,000 nominal purchase-money, but in reality not over $1,000,000, the receipts from which have ever since been received by them—amounting, in my opinion, to three times this amount—and on which no new iron has been placed—a property the gross income of which he states to be $1,000,000, which, under favorable circumstances, he states would yield a net income of $300,000 to pay interest on $20,000,000?

This is the most extraordinary proceeding that has ever occurred, and the most wonderful narration that has ever been made in any country or in any court, and demands careful inquiry by those who do not deal with fiction, but with the stern facts of public duty and honor and the real economies that concern the people.

There is certainly nothing in this most impossible narration which can justify Congress in turning over to them a half million acres of the public land of the United States with the settlers' homes upon it.

Certainly, Mr. Duval's proposition that Congress shall give these facetious gentlemen who have gotten up this interesting narrative for him public lands worth $2,000,000 in order that they may tax the people of the State in freight and transportation the interest on $20,000,000 of watered stock and fictitious indebtedness is the height of audacity.

When I consider the grand proportions of this fable I am content to sink into insignificance before it; and I do not now wonder that but one man in the United States can be found adequate to it.

The path of duty for those who are friends of the people I think is plain. Let the State bring suit for her million and a half of dollars and for all the money which the people have paid on the debts of this road, and litigate the right between the opposing creditors. Let the earnings of the road and a reasonable portion of the receiver's certificates be applied under the order of the court to its immediate construction to Tampa. As soon as a decree is reached let the road be sold for cash at its market value, and its rates regulated by some reasonable amount of cost. Mr. Duval threatens if Congress forfeits this land grant that he will hang up the title in the Supreme Court of the United States. I think the United States will be able to stand the controversy, and in the mean time I advise the people not to be alarmed at Mr. Duval's threats. If Congress undertakes to protect them I think it will accomplish it even in defiance of Mr. Duval. The spectacle of a receiver of a United States court making a wanton, malicious, and libelous attack, such as this, on a Senator of the United States for defending in the Senate the rights of the people of the State to homestead and cultivate the public lands against the claimants of a land grant that expired twenty years ago, is worthy of observation. The receiver is an officer of the court, subject to its orders. I again call the attention of the Senate to the necessity of proper action in this matter.

APPENDIX.

OFFICE OF TORRENCE & BRISTOW, REAL-ESTATE AGENTS,
Lakeland, Fla., April 22, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I note the fact that the Committee on Public Lands have requested you and the other of Florida's representatives to appear before said committee and make a statement of the matter. Knowing your zeal in this matter, I feel assured that the settlers were well represented by you on that occasion.

I wish, however, to call your attention to a matter which is of very vital interest to us in this portion of the "unearned" grant. In 1882 the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, then the Tropical and Peninsula Railroad, issued a circular inviting settlers to go on their lands, and agreeing to let them have said lands at Government prices whenever they got them on the market; in other words, when they earned them. As the road has changed hands, and as this company is not restrained by any legislation, the settlers feel very fearful that the road will either refuse to give them titles at all or will place their lands at such exorbitant figures as to virtually take them out of the settlers' hands.

You need no argument to convince you of the necessity of legislation. I only write because I fear that the pressure will be too strong for you to get your bill of forfeiture through, in which event I would respectfully ask that you secure protection for the above class of settlers and not leave them to the mercy of a soulless corporation.

You will doubtless wonder that so few petitions have come to you asking forfeiture, while a number have been presented asking a continuance of the charter for twelve months. The reason is very apparent to us here. The settlers now on the land are afraid to do anything, because in event the land being not forfeited they will be at the mercy of the railroad company, and could expect no favors from said company on account of having antagonized their interests. As a matter of revenge, the railroad company would probably refuse to give them their lands.

On the other hand, the railroad company have employed Judge White, late State land commissioner, to go throughout South Florida, in the region of this land grant, and circulate petitions asking an extension of the charter for twelve months longer.

The fact is, I am a friend of the railroad, but can not see that a year's extension will secure what they have been so long attempting. I hope very much to see the railroad completed and the resulting competition secured, but I feel that a year's extension only means another year's tying up of the lands.

This much, though, I again respectfully request your attention to: whatever legislation you secure let it protect the settler from unjust and exorbitant prices for their lands, and let it secure for them their titles, so long held in abeyance. Let something be done during this session of Congress to settle the matter.

Just now parties have applied for cash entry of all the land in the indemnity limits. Being rejected at the local land office of the State, they have appealed to the commissioner. In the mean time, these cash applicants are going through the country offering to settlers to withdraw their appeal as far as it affects the respective tracts settled upon if the settler will divide his lands with them (the speculating sharpers). You will say that the settler has a remedy, and so he has, but it entails long litigation, and the already tired-out settler will compromise rather than have a longer delay. It seems to me that appeals should only be allowed (to a cash applicant) from local office to Commissioner, and from Commissioner to Secretary, by the appellant giving bond in double the value of the land to secure settlers from damage, and that instead of a nominal tender being permitted, he should be obliged to leave the purchase-money on deposit at the land office.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

L. L. BRISTOW.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL, United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

CALL'S BIG BOMB—JACKSONVILLE MEN WILD OVER THE RAILWAY RESOLUTIONS—RECEIVER DUVAL'S OPINION—A DAY OF EXCITEMENT IN JACKSONVILLE—SENATOR UNSPARINGLY BERATED—"WHO IS PAYING FOR THIS?"—WHAT MR. DUVAL SAYS—TELEGRAPH, ETC.

The renewed attack of Senator CALL upon the land grants to the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, made in the United States Senate on Wednesday and reported in the Morning News yesterday morning, caused the most unprecedented excitement in this city. It was the topic of animated conversation in every place of business and upon the corners of the street. That it foreboded disaster to the business interests of Jacksonville was the almost unanimous verdict of the business community.

A demand for a meeting of the board of trade was made to consider the import of the Senator's conduct, but the jealousy with which the board is guarded prevented that action. Senator CALL has political friends in the city who would not willingly consent to have resolutions passed that might affect the Senator's political fortunes.

Vice-President Hart said that he regarded the Senator's action as full of gravest danger to the city's interest. He thought some action ought to be had, but he would not consent to taking the matter into the board of trade until he was assured that its action should be devoid of all factional and political effect.

President Daniel expressed about the same opinion. He was not in sympathy with the Senator's action, and undertook to express his opinions to Mr. CALL in a letter, written yesterday.

Governor Drew, Colonel Hart, and Mr. Schumacher called upon Receiver Duval yesterday afternoon to express their dissent from the Senator's action, and to learn, if possible, how they might strengthen the hands of the railway company. Mr. Duval replied that the question involved was one for Floridians to settle. He was here as an officer of the court. He has induced friends to and put it into the improvement of the railway system he has in charge. The fight made by the Senator had interrupted the investment, and capital could not be induced to come in until the matter was settled and security achieved. He could not be seriously affected, personally, by the Senator's warfare.

If the grant was canceled he could retire to New York, little the worse for the event, but Jacksonville business men would be differently affected.

To a reporter of the Morning News Mr. Duval gave, at request, a copy of the telegraphed correspondence had between himself and Senator CALL on Wednesday. It reads as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 21, 1886.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL, Washington, D. C.:

The information upon which you charge in the Senate that the petitions adverse to the forfeiture of the Florida Railway and Navigation land grants are coerced by any threats of mine or any of my officers, is unqualifiedly false and malicious to myself personally and an aspersion upon the thousands of signers understood by me to be gentlemen of the highest character and leading influence in their respective localities. Will you do them and me the justice to make this statement as public as your charge was made? Please answer.

H. R. DUVAL, Receiver.

To this Senator CALL replied as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1886.

H. R. DUVAL, Jacksonville, Fla.:

Your telegram read in the Senate and will be found in the RECORD to-morrow.

WILKINSON CALL.

Mr. Duval said that he had been very much surprised at that part of Senator CALL's speech relating to "coercion," and the statement of the Senator that the company had "threatened" the signers of the petition to Congress. The speech was a pack of lies from beginning to end, and the reading of the names of those signers should convince any man that they could not be coerced or threatened into signing any paper. Judge White had stated to him that the signers were, in the main, the very best and most in all South Florida. To charge, then, that the company had influenced them in either a covert way or openly was maliciously false.

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., April 26, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: It has long been a matter of astonishment to me that our national law-makers have not given the whole matter of railroad receiverships in the Federal courts an overhauling. What greater anomaly than the running of railroads by the judiciary? In England no application to a court of chancery to engage in that business was ever seriously listened to by her chancellors until the passage, a few years since, of a special act of Parliament conferring the jurisdiction. In this country the courts embarked in it at first with hesitation, and only under special circumstances. In 2 Wallace the Supreme Court of the United States announced that the proposition to put 95 miles of railroad in the hands of a receiver to secure the payment of a twelve-thousand-dollar judgment lien too absurd for argument. On Cutting's judgment for $104,000, there seems to have been no difficulty in the courts taking control of a whole system of railroads of about 1,000 miles in length. I wonder it had never occurred to our law-makers, in casting about for all sorts of expedients for lightening the burdens of the Federal courts, how much they could do in that direction by depriving them of the jurisdiction to run railroads.

They should be absolutely prohibited from appointing a receiver where the insolvent road was entirely within the limits of one State. If the interests of commerce between the States required Federal management of a line of roads running through several States, the appointment of a receiver or manager should be under a law of Congress strictly limiting his powers and defining his liabilities; and the enforcing of these liabilities as regards parties injured by him or his employés should be at common law and by courts and juries of the vicinage of the parties damaged. You and I recollect a railroad receivership lasting for several years under appointment of the Supreme Court at Washington, during which time a poor man in Florida could only obtain redress for the killing of a cow, provided the receiver was unwilling, by prosecuting his claim at Washington! Conceive of anything more monstrous than that! As the receiver in that case was a gentleman, I do not say he ever drove a claimant to that desperate expedient. But the American people, however poor, do not like to enjoy their rights by sufferance or as a matter of favor, and God forbid that they ever should. I wish you would talk this matter over with my old friends of the Judiciary Committee and other level-headed Senators, and see if some legislation on this matter can not be provided.

WALDO, ALACHUA COUNTY, FLA., April 27, 1886.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
Washington, D. C.:

I avail myself of a moment's leisure to write you concerning some of the methods that the railroad company and their employers are resorting to bring odium on you, and to compass your destruction if it is in their power, and to say to you that I believe the people of Florida will sustain you in your course, and flock to your rescue irrespective of parties, and hold up your hands whilst you battle for justice and right, as you are doing. They resort to slander, misrepresentation, and falsehood, to injure you. They keep paid attorneys in nearly all sections to do their talking, lying, and bulldozing. I was prompted to write this letter from the manner I saw them circulating a petition this evening, asking Congress to defeat your bill. We have a very affable agent here circulating a petition to-day. It would shame a heathen Chinee to see that smile, so childlike and bland, that would overspread his countenance as he would approach a citizen with his petition, saying, "Will you please sign our petition asking the railroad company to hurry up and complete their road to Tampa." Oh, yes; says the thoughtless citizen, and down goes his name without ever reading it. They caught our old friend S. J. Renard that way. I have reason to believe he would have seen them in hell before he would have signed it if he had known its purport. The editors along the line of their road, with a pocket full of railroad passes, are singing pæans of praises to the donors and extolling their magnificence and grandeur and the wonders they are working for Florida, but omit to say anything about their tariff rates on freight or passenger travel, which is regulated not by what it is worth but by what it will bear. Railroad commissioners in the Western States have shown that freight can be hauled over a road that cost $40,000 per mile at 1 cent per ton per mile and pay 10 per cent. interest on the investment, whilst our F. R. & N. Road that was built by the State and cost them nothing, charges on hay, corn, and oats, all articles that the farmers must have, 47 cents per hundred from Jacksonville to Waldo, 57 miles, and all other articles in like proportion; that freight from New York to Baldwin, a distance of near 1,000 miles (I don't remember the exact distance), will be no more than from Baldwin to Waldo, a distance of 37 miles. Are the people of Florida under any obligations for such treatment?

All that is necessary is to let the people of Florida understand your position, and you will find they will rally around you as of old. The company are making a determined fight against you; are determined to slaughter you if possible. Send me several copies of your speech on that subject. I will see them placed where they will do the most good. I prevented a half-dozen from signing the petition to-day; numbers who have signed will make the explanation of how they came to sign it. If you need any counter-petitions sent in, indicate their purport. I will see Sheriff Tucker next week—he is a friend you can rely on—and consult with him in the matter, and if necessary we will go to work. You will see by the Times-Union, in an interview with Receiver Duval, that he proposes, if Congress sustains you, that his company will return back to New York. That virtually means what they have repeatedly threatened before, to stop the cars, tear up tracks, and I suppose to retire on their ill-gotten gains and let the people suffer the want of a railroad. If this is not bulldozing, what is it? And if asking people to sign a petition to have their road extended to Tampa when it is asking Congress to confirm their land grant is not deception and lying, what is it?

Although comparatively a stranger to you, having met but a few times at Bronson nearly ten years ago, I take the liberty of trespassing on your time with these statements of facts in hopes they may be of some use to you—at least you will know that some of your constituents approve your course—and evinces a friendship formed at our first acquaintance and strengthened by time and better acquaintance through your public and official acts, which I heartily indorse, believing them to be just and right, for the best interest of Florida and welfare of her citizens.

In conclusion permit me to express to you my sympathy and best wishes for your success. If I have intruded too much on your valuable time, I shall simply say the interest I feel in the welfare and prosperity of my adopted State and the sympathy I have for her people must plead my apology for so doing.

Yours, truly,

———.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Grange No. 371, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pennsylvania, praying for such legislation as will suppress the manufacture and sale of all imitation dairy products; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of Grange No. 371, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of a law admitting agricultural raw materials free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of Montrose Post, No. 38, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Colorado, praying for the passage of a law embodying the recommendations of the special committee of the Grand Army of the Republic relative to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of the citizens of Ponce de Leon, Holmes County, Florida, praying for the passage of "the bill introduced in the Senate by Hon. WILKINSON CALL to revoke the grant of United States lands to the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad Company;" which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of citizens of Woodville, N. Y., praying for the passage of a law taxing all imitations of butter at 10 cents per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Jefferson, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Wescustogo Grange, No. 27, Patrons of Husbandry, of North Yarmouth, Me., praying for the passage of the House bill taxing oleomargarine and all other imitations of butter; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of 45 wholesale dealers of Portland, Me., praying for the enactment into a law of the bill introduced into the Senate by Hon. WARNER MILLER, of New York, taxing oleomargarine and butterine 10 cents a pound; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2166) for the relief of John F. Cadwallader, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1641) for the relief of Frederick Foote, of Fairfax County, Virginia, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1834) for the relief of George S. Fisher, to report the same back adversely. I am requested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] to have the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., reported it without amendment.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2265) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, widow and administratrix of William Perine, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2397) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2266) for the relief of John Williams; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 286) referring to the Court of Claims the claims for property seized by General Johnston on the Utah expedition, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1554) for the relief of William Talbert, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 859) granting a pension to Charlotte O'Neal;
A bill (H. R. 1902) granting an increase of pension to Simon Fought;
A bill (H. R. 16) granting a pension to Nancy L. Ribble;
A bill (H. R. 7118) for the relief of Bailey Hascall;
A bill (H. R. 3205) granting a pension to George W. Guyse;
A bill (H. R. 1330) granting a pension to Martin Taylor;
A bill (H. R. 7167) for the relief of Mrs. Maria Hunter;
A bill (H. R. 3193) granting a pension to Mrs. Edna Roberts;
A bill (H. R. 1184) granting a pension to Stephen Gardner;
A bill (H. R. 5127) granting a pension to Mary A. Ripley;
A bill (H. R. 6331) granting a pension to George Anna Lippe;
A bill (S. 1492) for the relief of Ellen Sadler, sister of John Sadler; and A bill (H. R. 3326) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1439) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 356) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON. On behalf of the Committee on Printing I report back the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office with certain amendments proposed by the Senate Committee on Printing, and I ask that it may be printed as proposed to be amended and recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2199) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to report it without amendment. I desire at a very early day to call up the bill and ask for action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CHACE. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes providing for additional pay for postal cars, to report it with an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the original bill has not been sent to the desk. It is necessary for the Chair to have the original bill. As the bill is now reported it is not on the Calendar.

Mr. CHACE. I am satisfied that the bill may be laid aside informally for the present. I should like to have it taken up at the conclusion of the routine business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CHACE subsequently said: As many Senators wish to see in print the amendment to the bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes providing for additional pay for postal cars, I withdraw my request for its consideration this morning in order that it may be printed, and I will call it up again to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and amendment will be printed, together with the report.

MARIE HOLLANDS.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to ask to call up the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with a view to having the vote by which it was passed reconsidered and the bill indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin from the Committee on Pensions asks for the consideration of the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands, and moves that the vote on its passage be reconsidered. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SAWYER. I now move that the bill be indefinitely postponed, as a bill has been passed covering the same subject.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations;

A bill (H. R. 444) to amend 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 6980) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Laurenda G. Cummings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2268) to grant leaves of absence to employés in the United States navy-yards; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2269) granting a pension to William Dickens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2270) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2271) granting a pension to N. J. Myers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2272) granting a pension to Robert Chawner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2273) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Reed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2274) for the relief of William P. Thorne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2275) for the relief of David R. Haggard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 2276) for the relief of Mrs. Eunice S. Nichols; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 2277) for the relief of George P. Ihrie, of California, late additional aide-de-camp on the war staff of General U. S. Grant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2278) to provide for allotment of land in severalty to United Peorias and Miamis in Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate in the case of John C. Quackenbush, be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Alexander J. Mueller, now on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SPOONER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Lucien T. Goyaux, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate for the purpose of referring them to the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, it was Ordered, That Mrs. E. C. Ambler have leave to withdraw the papers in her case from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DOLPH. Yesterday I submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say that it may go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ask for that change in the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that change in the reference will be made. The Chair hears none.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. HARRIS. I moved on last Thursday the reference of the President's message on the subject of labor arbitration to the Committee on the Judiciary. I selected that committee because the message looked to the creation of a tribunal semi-judicial. The Committee on Education and Labor, by its chairman, seems to think that it ought to have the consideration of the question. I am indifferent to which committee it goes, but I should like to have the question disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the message of the President now lying on the table in respect to a commission on labor arbitration be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Is that the motion?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire desires it to go to that committee. I moved at first that it go to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I am indifferent as to which committee it shall go.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to have the message referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. INGALLS and Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the present motion.

Mr. BLAIR. The motion was to refer the message to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Tennessee to say he was indifferent, and the Chair was about putting the question on referring the message to the Committee on Education and Labor. The question is on that motion.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR KEITHSBURG.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, according to the order of the Senate the first business in order is the consideration of bills in relation to bridges. The first bridge bill in order will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 3370) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburg, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ILLINOIS AND DES MOINES RIVERS.

The bill (H. R. 3371) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Illinois River, in the State of Illinois, and the Des Moines River, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT WINONA.

The bill (H. R. 5673) to authorize the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from Winona, Minn., to the opposite shore in Wisconsin was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 1516) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Winona, State of Minnesota, to the opposite shore of said river in the State of Wisconsin was indefinitely postponed.

YELLOWSTONE RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 6358) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River in Montana was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT PIERRE, DAK.

The bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 15, section 3, before the word "court," to insert the word "circuit;" in line 16, after the words "United States," to insert, "or any district court;" in line 17, after the word "Dakota," to strike out "of competent" and insert "within whose," and in the same line, after the word "jurisdiction," to strike out the words "in which;" so as to read:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in any circuit court of the United States or any district court of the Territory of Dakota, within whose jurisdiction any portion of said bridge may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6 of the bill, as follows:

That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 4, after the word "War," to insert:

Provided, That the same shall not be less than 164 feet each in the clear.

So as to read:

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be built with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall be of such width and height above the water as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the same shall not be less than 164 feet each in the clear; and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river; and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10 of section 3, after the word "pivot," to insert the word "span," so as to read:

Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw or pivot span shall be over the main channel at an accessible point, and the spans shall be of such width and height above the water as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the words "Secretary of War," in line 12 of section 3, to insert:

Provided, That said draw or pivot spans shall not be less than 164 feet in the clear on each side of the draw or pivot pier.

So as to read:

Provided, That said draw or pivot spans shall not be less than 164 feet in the clear on each side of the draw or pivot pier; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with and the bridge itself at right angles to the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 36, after "United States," to strike out "for the middle district of Tennessee;" and in line 37, before the word "any," to strike out "which" and insert "whose jurisdiction;" so as to read:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States in whose jurisdiction any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT RED WING, MINN.

The bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore in the State of Wisconsin was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. That if said bridge is constructed as a wagon bridge, the said company may charge such reasonable rates of toll for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds and for the transit of animals and foot passengers as may from time to time be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 1491) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, State of Minnesota, to the opposite shore of said river in the State of Wisconsin was indefinitely postponed.

KANSAS RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to add to section 1 "for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the section read:

That the Interstate Rapid Transit Railway Company, a corporation duly and legally organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, its successors or assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Kansas River, in Wyandotte County, in the State of Kansas, between the city of Wyandotte and the city of Kansas, Kans., at the point where said company's line of railway, as now projected, crosses said river, near the mouth thereof. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of its railway trains, and, at the option of said company by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 1, line 12, after the word "reasonable," to strike out "and customary in said locality;" so as to read:

That the Red River Bridge Company of Texas, composed of Frank Colbert, W. B. Munson, J. B. McDougal, J. R. Carr, Samuel Star, J. T. Munson, Edward Perry, and L. L. Maughs, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railway and wagon bridge across Red River between the State of Texas and the Chickasaw Nation of the Indian Territory, at any accessible point on said river near Denison, Tex., that may be selected by said company; and said company shall be permitted to charge and take such rates of toll for crossing said bridge as may be reasonable, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; the said bridge to be of such height as not to interfere with the navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota if the Red River is at this point a navigable river?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir, as the committee have been informed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. ALLISON. I see no provision in this bill to authorize other railroad companies to use this bridge. This seems to be an exclusive charter, and also I see no power reserved to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. ALLISON. I see none.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That clause is very full. The structure is under the entire control of the Secretary of War. The Senator from Texas will be able to state to the Senate the condition of the stream at that point and show that this bill is altogether sufficient.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish any explanation except that if this is a navigable river other railroads should be authorized to cross the bridge.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Texas will make a statement which will satisfy the Senate.

Mr. COKE. The river never has been navigable at that point. There are two railroad systems that cross the river just below.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE NEAR BROWN'S FERRY, TEXAS.

The bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cooke County, Texas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the word "toll," to insert "to be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the section read:

That to the Gainesville and Chicksaw Bridge Company, a corporation created under the laws of Texas by charter filed January 24, 1885, is granted the consent of the Government to construct and maintain for ninety years a bridge, and approaches thereto, over Red River, at or within 3 miles of Brown's Ferry, in Cooke County, Texas, to be used for the passage of foot-passengers, animals, and vehicles of all kinds, for reasonable rates of toll, to be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the proviso to section 3, in line 16, to add:

And that if at any time navigation of the said river shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said bridge, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said company to alter and change the said bridge, at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free and complete navigation without impediment; and if upon reasonable notice to said company to make such change or improvements the said company fails to do so, the Secretary of War shall have authority to make the same at the expense of said company, and all rights conferred by this act shall be forfeited; and Congress shall have power to do any and all things necessary to secure the free navigation of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I see in this bill provision is made for the preservation of the navigation of the river, and no provision is made for the use of this bridge by other railroads.

Mr. McMILLAN. The point at which this bridge is to be erected is far above navigation on the Red River, as the committee are informed by the Senator from Texas, who is quite familiar with the location. If the Senator from Texas will make a statement, it will be entirely satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. COKE. The bill now before the Senate provides for a bridge 40 miles above the one providided for by the bill which was passed just preceding this, and both are a long way above two railroad bridges, neither of which has draws, and the fact is that there is no navigation there.

Mr. ALLISON. The reason I made the inquiry is that, as the Senator from Texas will see, the committee have very carefully provided for the protection of the navigation of the river. There was in that some little implication that the river was navigable. That was the reason I made the inquiry.

Mr. McMILLAN. That was done out of abundant caution, so that if the river should ever become navigable at that point the provisions here would enable the Secretary of War to secure all the rights of navigation.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGES IN OREGON.

The bill (S. 1971) authorizing the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, to construct a bridge across Young's Bay and a bridge or permanent roadway across Skipanon Creek, in the State of Oregon, was indefinitely postponed, a House bill upon the same subject having been passed.

BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to make a motion in regard to some of these bills. There are certain of these House bills which have been amended by the action of the Senate just taken. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move in those cases that the Senate ask for a conference and appoint conferees. The bills are as follows:

The bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road;

The bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.;

The bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River;

The bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore, in the State of Wisconsin;

The bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid-Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

The bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River; and

The bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cooke county, Texas.

In these several cases I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and I ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. VEST were appointed in each case.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORGAN. On behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations I ask the Senate to take up for consideration Order of Business 869, being the bill (S. 2225) to indemnify certain subjects of the Chinese Empire for losses sustained by the violence of a mob at Rock Springs, in the Territory of Wyoming, in September, 1885.

Mr. PLUMB. I gave notice on Monday that at the close of the morning business this morning I would move to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill. That was in accordance with the instructions of the Committee on Appropriations. I waited this morning until after the order made yesterday relating to bridge bills was concluded, and I desire to make my motion now to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill. It is somewhat necessary that I should have the bill taken up, for I may have to be absent after to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The day before yesterday I gave notice that on yesterday morning I would ask the Senate to permit me to take from the table a certain memorial with a view of submitting a few remarks before it was referred. I gave way yesterday to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN], giving notice again that this morning, after his order was disposed of, I should ask the Senate to permit me to occupy the time for a very brief period on that question. I now ask that the memorial heretofore presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] be taken up for the purpose of enabling me to submit a few remarks before it is referred. I will state to the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kansas that I shall not occupy the time of the Senate at any great length.

Mr. MORGAN. I certainly do not intend to antagonize this bill with an appropriation bill, neither do I intend to be guilty of a discourtesy to the Senator from Oregon, who wishes to proceed with his remarks. Finding that the time is perhaps not sufficient to consider this bill this morning, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of acting upon it as speedily as possible, and I therefore give notice that to-morrow morning, after the routine morning business is passed over, I shall ask the Senate to consider this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdrawing his motion, the Senator from Kansas is entitled, under the rules, to preference on a motion to take up an appropriation bill. It is the duty of the Chair to submit that question.

Mr. PLUMB. I will move to take up the bill, and when that is done I will yield for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Oregon to make his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill being taken up, I will consent that it be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Oregon may be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I now move to take up the memorial presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] on the 8th of April from the New York Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying Congress to furnish to the Chinese in this country the same protection as is afforded all other persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon. The Chair hears no objection, and the memorial is before the Senate on the question of reference.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, I arrested the reference of this memorial when it was presented to the Senate by the honorable Senator from New York, for the reason that on hearing it read I believed it contained language in part which conveyed an erroneous impression, and one which in justice to the people of the State of Oregon, if not, indeed, to the people of the State of California and the Territory of Washington, ought not to be permitted to go unchallenged to the country. This memorial, coming as it does from the New York Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, composed of two hundred and eighty ministers of the gospel, and representing a church constituency of nearly forty-five thousand members, is entitled, as a matter of course, to the highest consideration; and ordinarily, in the absence of evident misinformation or mistake, a memorial coming from such a source would in so far as its statement of fact is concerned import absolute verity.

This memorial, Mr. President, after reciting various provisions of the treaty of 1880 between the United States and the Government of China—and I may say reciting them correctly—alleges their violation by an alleged statement of facts in the following language:

2. That most flagrant and grievous outrages have been perpetrated upon the Chinese in Wyoming and Washington Territories and in the States of Oregon and California; and in many places in that portion of our country the purpose is still openly expressed of driving out the Chinese inhabitants.

3. That in the course of these outrages, not only has much property belonging to Chinese residents been destroyed, but many persons have been put to death.

It will be observed that this memorial asserts that not merely in the Territory of Wyoming but in the States of Oregon and California and in the Territory of Washington not only much property of Chinese residents has been destroyed, but that many persons have been put to death in the course of the perpetration of outrages upon and persecutions against Chinese residents of those localities; and thus the impression is conveyed in positive statement from this responsible source that in the State of Oregon and in the State of California and in the Territory of Washington not only a large amount of property belonging to Chinese residents has been destroyed, but that many persons have been put to death in the course of alleged outrages and persecutions of Chinese residents of those localities.

Now, then, Mr. President, speaking for Oregon alone at this time, and being as I believe fully and correctly advised in the matter in reference to which I speak, I assert that this statement, in so far as it relates to the State of Oregon and the people of the State of Oregon, is an entire misapprehension and mistake. I say this in reference to the allegation as to the destruction of the property of Chinese residents and in reference to the allegation that many persons have been put to death; and I assert here that if ever at any time in the history of Oregon down to the present hour—and I have lived in that State nearly twenty-six years—there has been a solitary Chinaman or a solitary Chinese woman in any manner injured in life or limb in the course of any persecution or outrages against that class as a race, much less put to death, then I have never yet heard of it.

I go further. I assert here without fear of successful contradiction from any responsible source that never in the State of Oregon, from its earliest history to the present hour, has there been a single Chinese person, male or female, in any manner injured in life or limb, much less put to death, in the course of persecutions or outrages against the Chinese as a class; nor is it true that much, if any, property of Chinese residents has been destroyed.

In two instances and only two, each occurring within the present year, one at Oregon City and the other near Albina, a few persons have committed certain outrages upon a few Chinese persons by ordering them out of their places of abode and causing them to remove with their household and other effects to other localities. That is true, but these outrages to which I have referred have received the universal condemnation in the State of Oregon, including the city of Portland, of all parties, all classes, and all persons, save and except perhaps the very few who were engaged in them.

And, Mr. President, I will state further, that even in these instances of outrage to which I have referred, if there was one dollar's worth of property destroyed belonging to Chinese residents I have yet to learn of the fact. And yet, sir, so intelligent and respectable a body of men as the New York Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the State of New York assert to the contrary, and through the medium of the Senate of the United States, by memorial, convey the impression to the country that in the State of Oregon not only a large amount of property has been destroyed belonging to Chinese residents, but also that many persons have been put to death in the course of persecutions of Chinese residents in that State. And not only so, but recently the illustrated press of the East, the pictorial papers of the Eastern cities, have abounded in illustrations representing the people of Oregon, or at least a portion of them, engaged in the murderous act of destroying the lives of Chinese.

Now, Mr. President, why this continued misrepresentation by the Eastern press, by Eastern associations, by Eastern men, statesmen and others, of the true status of the Chinese question upon the Pacific coast? Why in the face of overwhelming testimony to the contrary must it continually, and until the statement becomes stale by reason of its iteration, be asserted that the only persons opposed to further Chinese immigration in the Pacific States and Territories are the sand-lot and hoodlum element, the irresponsible and criminal classes? Is it because of a willful desire on the part of Eastern men, and of the Eastern press, and of Eastern associations to misrepresent the facts? Or is it rather because of the want of correct information in regard to a question so vital to the interests not only of the people of the Pacific coast but of this whole country? I am rather inclined to believe that in part it is due to both.

While it is a fact that the Associated Press dispatches of this country are in the main fair, creditable, honest, and entitled to the confidence of the public, and report correctly the current events of the day, it is a fact notorious, I regret to say, in the State I have the honor in part to represent here, that the reports of that association coming from the State of Oregon, dictated, directed, dominated, controlled, as we all know they are, by the editor of the Oregonian in the city of Portland, one Henry W. Scott, a disgruntled politician, and I may say a disgraced politician, who ten years ago was by President Grant kicked out of the custom-house in that city for malfeasance in office and because of his refusal to turn over to the Government some $16,000 or $17,000 of the public funds in his possession, are frequently gross perversions, and often absolutely false in fact and not worthy of credit; and for months past he, through these press reports, has been misrepresenting the people of Oregon and the people of the Pacific coast on this great question of such vital interest to them; and perhaps these misrepresentations are not confined wholly to press reports coming from the State of Oregon. And in this connection I desire to state that, aside from an irresponsible criminal class which infest every city and State, and of these I presume Oregon has its fair proportion—perhaps no more or less in proportion to its population than any other State—the people of that State are as peaceable, orderly, and law-abiding as any on the face of the earth; and this remark applies with equal truth to the people of California and Washington Territory.

You will all remember what a furor was created all over the East a few days ago in regard to the manner in which it was alleged the Chinese minister was treated on his arrival at the port of San Francisco. It was heralded all over the East and proclaimed in nearly every paper of the East that a great insult had been offered to the Chinese Government by the Federal officials in the city of San Francisco. When you come to simmer it down, however, and get at the facts, what do you find? You find that the Federal officials, the collector of the port, Mr. Hager, and others, simply complied with the law, no more, no less, as will appear from a statement of Collector Hager himself, which I desire to have read. I ask that the letter of Mr. Hager to the editor of the Bulletin in San Francisco, which I send to the desk, may be read, that this matter may be properly understood by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Daily Evening Bulletin, San Francisco, Monday, April 19, 1886. Fourth edition.]

A CARD FROM COLLECTOR HAGER—THE LAW IN THE CASE OF THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

Editor Bulletin:

Permit me to return you my thanks for your kind words in my behalf against the unjust assaults, based on false telegrams, made upon me by the Eastern press.

I desire, however, to make one important correction.

In your article of Saturday you seem to infer that this office had instructions from Secretary Bayard and the Secretary of the Treasury directing the collector to land the Chinese embassy at once, without regard to the provisions of the restriction act. This is a mistake. The instructions received at this office are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1886.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of State, dated the 20th instant, in which he requests that you be instructed to admit to free entry the effects of Chang Yin Hoon, the new Chinese minister, who is expected to arrive at your port, per steamer Gaelic, from Hong Kong, on the 8th of April next, accompanied by his secretaries, attachés, and servants, and that the usual courtesies may be extended to him on his arrival. You will please comply with such request, and accord to the said minister and his suite all necessary facilities for the passage, free of duty, of their baggage and effects.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, San Francisco, Cal.

You will observe that those instructions in no way relate to the personnel of the embassy, but solely to the entry and passage, free of duty, of its effects and baggage.

Section 13 of the restriction act was left in full force, and reads:

"SEC. 13. That this act shall not apply to diplomatic and other officers of the Chinese or other governments, traveling upon the business of that government, whose credentials shall be taken as equivalent to the certificate in this act mentioned, and shall exempt them and their body and household servants from the provisions of this act as to other Chinese persons."

When the embassador declared his credentials were inaccessible and could not be produced the requirements of the law were waived, and he and his suite, servants, &c., were admitted without any evidence of their official character, in contravention of the express letter of the restriction act, and by extending to them facilities unauthorized by the letter of instructions.

By courtesy, which under similar conditions would have been denied to an American minister entering China or European countries, this embassy was admitted; a strict enforcement of the law would have detained them on the ship until their official character had been made manifest.

JOHN S. HAGER, Collector.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Now, Mr. President, there seems to be a disposition on the part of the Eastern press and of Eastern people to create an impression all over this country that the people of the Pacific coast are disposed to heap insult upon the Chinese Government and upon the representatives of that government. Nothing could be further from the truth; and this will be found to be so whenever proper investigation is made.

The other day, when the press announced that the Chinese embassy were on the way to this city, it was proclaimed in the several papers of this city that they would arrive at a certain time and that proper arrangements would doubtless be made for their reception. Who ever heard of such a thing when the representatives of other governments were about to arrive? When the minister from Great Britain is about to arrive at the depot, is there a hullaballoo raised all over the country that we must uncover our heads and do obeisance to him at the depot? Nothing of the kind.

I notice that the papers of the city stated that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body did his duty and was present to receive the embassy. That doubtless was not so, and I simply refer to it for the purpose of showing how much reliance can be placed in the representations made in the press of the East in regard to the Chinese question. Of course I know that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as he now indicates by shaking his head, did not go down to the depot to receive the Chinese embassy, and of course everybody else in the country knows it, but I simply refer to it to show that there appears to be a determination on the part of the press and the people of the East to misrepresent this Chinese question in its every shape and form, and create contrasts between the treatment of Chinese officials by Government officials at San Francisco and Government officials in Washington in a manner that is unfavorable to the former.

Now, Mr. President, coming back again to the misrepresentations of the people of Oregon by the Eastern press, and especially by the pictorial press. Harper, for instance, a few days ago pictured the scales with a dead Chinaman in one end and a supposed assassin in the other end, conveying the impression that the people of Oregon were engaged in murdering Chinamen; and it was given out as an illustration of the fact that the people of Oregon are a lawless, law-breaking band of people, engaged not only in the demolition of property but in the wanton and merciless destruction of human life.

Mr. President, once for all in answer to the charge that has been made time and time again, and repeated until it has become, as I said a moment ago, stale, to the effect that the opposition to further Chinese immigration on the Pacific coast comes alone from the sand-lot and hoodlum element, from the irresponsible and criminal classes, I desire to attract the attention of the Senate to the proceedings of a State convention recently held at the city of Sacramento, in the State of California. That convention remained in session three full days. It was made up of two State conventions. It came together, in other words, in two parts, one part composed of the non-partisan, anti-coolie State convention that some time previously met at the city of San José, in that State, and the other part was composed of delegates selected by the boards of supervisors of the different counties of the State of California.

When the two conventions came together they consolidated, and that joint convention was composed of many of the ablest representative men of both political parties of the State of California. It was purely and distinctively a non-partisan convention. That convention appointed a committee and instructed it to draught a memorial to Congress on the Chinese question, to be submitted to the convention for its action and approval. That committee was composed of the following-named gentlemen: The chairman was Hon. John F. Swift, one of the ablest and most distinguished lawyers of the State of California, and one of its representative men, one of the ministers plenipotentiary from the United States to China that helped to make the treaty between the United States Government and the Chinese Government of 1880, and you will find his name attached to that treaty. Another member of that committee was Hon. Aaron A. Sargent, for many years a member of the National House of Representatives, subsequently for six years a Senator from the State of California in this body, and still later our minister to the court of Berlin. The other members of that committee were Hons. E. Anthony, E. A. Davis, H. V. Morehouse; each and all are representative men of the State of California—no sand-lot or hoodlum element.

That committee composed of those five able, distinguished, and representative men of that State, appointed by that consolidated State convention, draughted a memorial, and the chairman, Hon. J. F. Swift, presented it to the convention, and it was unanimously approved by that convention.

But as to the character of that State convention I will let one of the leading journals of the city of San Francisco speak. I read from the Evening Bulletin, one of the evening journals of that city, in the issue of March 13, 1886. The title of the leading editorial is "The convention," and the article reads as follows:

THE CONVENTION.

The convention which had been in session at Sacramento for three days, and finally adjourned yesterday, is entitled to be regarded as one of the most remarkable that ever assembled in the State. It came together in two parts—that is to say, an adjourned session of a convention held some time since at San José and a new convention appointed on the suggestion of a Sacramento committee by the several boards of supervisors. In amalgamating these conventions there was a chance for much dissension. But all obstacles to a harmonious blending were finally overcome, and the two bodies became one before any real business was transacted. The general unanimity which followed was perhaps the most remarkable feature. Upon one proposition there was no division of sentiment whatever, namely, that no more Chinese should be allowed to enter this country. There is probably not now a man in this State who would advocate the admission of any more coolies. There were 883 of them five years ago against 154,658 in the negative. The only difference of opinion was in relation to what is to be done with the Chinese who are here. It was over this point that the fiercest battle raged. The form which the proposed boycott subsequently assumed was in the nature of a compromise.

The convention was fairly representative—more representative than many of the recent political conventions. It contained among its members some of the ablest men in the State. In its memorial to Congress, from the pen of John F. Swift, it has contributed a new and brilliant chapter to the literature of the crusade against the new form of slavery in the Pacific States. In it Mr. Swift took what may be called the century view of the problem. He examined it in the phase that would alone have attracted statesmen. If Bismarck, or Gladstone, or the late Lord Beaconsfield, had to deal with the question, it is from the standpoint of Mr. Swift that they would have examined it. The memorial is a fitting cap-sheaf for the literary structure that has already been erected. Coolyism has been considered so far only in its present phases. It is a form of contract labor, differing in no essential particular from the slavery only lately destroyed by the sword. Under its blighting influence California in odd spots presents some of the aspects of a slave State to-day. Labor is degraded and despised in quarters where it ought to be dignified. Coolyism likewise disorganizes our industrial system and drives the white race to the wall. It underbids it and forces it from the field. The gradual pauperization of our own people is the price we are paying for it. Coolyism further is draining the State of its resources. It is making California a dependency of China. It is said we have the benefit of the cooly labor. But what is the residuum of a cigar smoked or a pair of shoes worn out? And lastly, coolyism has introduced new vices which swell our own formidable list. It has dragged down our people instead of being elevated by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause. It is the duty of the Chair at 2 o'clock to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce. If there be no objection the Senator from Oregon will be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that as soon as the Senator concludes I will move to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I continue the article:

The memorial to Congress adopted by the convention is the complement of this argument. Mr. Swift took the twentieth-century view of the problem, looking down upon it through the long vista of generations. In an impressive, eloquent, and forcible manner he has wound up the controversy. Only in one respect does the memorial become retrospective, and that is in the case of Anson Burlingame, the author of the infamous treaty which bears his name. It throws new light on the man who as deliberately sold out his country as Benedict Arnold. The only difference is that Burlingame technically denationalized himself before he did it. The memorial indicates the money that was to be made by inducing the European governments to give up the extra-territoriality which they enjoy in certain portions of China. Of course we gave it up without a moment's thought in the delirium of gush which Burlingame so skillfully produced. With this lever he expected to operate on the governments of Europe, but they were not so easily taken in. While we have not the least doubt that that was one of the objects which that money-making and histrionic diplomatist had in view, we think that it is equally certain that he was the tool of the man-dealers. It is not at all likely that he was ignorant of the unholy traffic to which he was opening up this country when he inserted the provision allowing the transportation of coolies under the pretense of free emigration.

There is internal evidence in the treaty itself that there was a foreknowledge on the part of those who got it up of the trouble that it was going to create. The memorial does not go too far when it says that if Burlingame had been a native of China and had changed his allegiance as Burlingame did while employed in a foreign mission, China would have cut off his head on his return. In any other nation but ours he would have been considered a disgraced man, and that though he had not gone back on his country in any other manner than in his temporary allegiance.

Apart from the literature which the convention is the medium of contributing to the great cause its deliberations were fairly conducted. Though cast up from so many different sources, its earnestness, determination, and essential unanimity were conspicuous from first to last. It was in some respects an unknown quantity to the politicians. They were, therefore, present in considerable numbers. The convention may be said to have been chock full of governors. But it was not diverted from its purpose, and wound up with a solemn declaration of its non-partisan programme.

Mr. President, although the memorial prepared by the committee to which I have referred and which was unanimously adopted by the convention which this editorial describes has been presented to the Senate, and I believe also to the House, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; it has never yet been read, so far as I am advised, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, nor has it ever been printed either in the RECORD, so far as I know, or in any other form, and before concluding I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that that memorial, able, exhaustive, dignified, comprehensive as it is, shall be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and unless that consent is given I shall take the liberty of reading it myself before concluding my remarks, in order that it may find a place in the records of the Senate.

But before asking that consent, Mr. President, I desire to state that I hope the Committee on Foreign Relations will at an early day take up and consider the several bills introduced in this body and referred to that committee bearing upon this great question; and I now warn presidential aspirants in this body of both political parties, if there are any—I do not think there are any—that if they undertake to deal with this great question of further Chinese immigration to this country upon any other basis or upon any other idea than that of total and absolute prohibition in the future, they will be treading upon dangerous ground.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this California memorial, which has already been presented to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, may be inserted, as a part of my remarks, in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has to inform the Senator from Oregon that the memorial was presented by the Chair and was about to be referred when the Senator from Oregon himself asked that, without printing and without reference, it be laid on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Oregon the memorial, after it was presented, was laid upon the table without any further order and without any reference. It has not been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I inquire which Senator from Oregon is referred to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not himself remember, but he is advised by the Chief Clerk that the Senator from Oregon now on the floor himself moved to lay this memorial on the table, saying that he desired to submit some remarks, and there was no reference of it at all. The occupant of the chair does not remember the circumstance distinctly himself.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Of course I am attaching no blame to the Chair or any person.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial is upon the table. It has not been referred.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I think there is some misapprehension. If my attention was called to that memorial when it was presented, I was acting under an entire misapprehension.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will direct the record to be found, but, as the Chair understands, the memorial is now lying on the table awaiting the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the memorial to which he refers, which lies on the table, be now printed in the RECORD.

Mr. INGALLS. What is that memorial?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to printing anything in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a memorial——

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator's request to be that it be printed as a part of his remarks, not necessarily printed in the RECORD by itself, but I understood him to desire that it should appear as a part of his remarks.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I confess I am surprised, and I shall be still more surprised if I find that the report of the proceedings of any day of this session shall show, that I asked that this particular memorial lie on the table. If I did, I acted under a misapprehension, supposing it was some other matter, from the simple fact that I have been watching from day to day to see that the memorial was presented by one of the Senators from the State of California.

Mr. INGALLS. May we be informed what this memorial is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Senator from Oregon what memorial he refers to?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I refer to the memorial sent to the Senate by the State convention in California.

Mr. INGALLS. There evidently is a misunderstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a misunderstanding as to the memorial the Senator from Oregon alludes to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will straighten the matter in a moment if the Chair will allow me. The Chair is under a misapprehension. The Chair misunderstood me. I was not referring to the memorial now under discussion. I was referring to the memorial of the Sacramento convention, which was some days ago presented to the Senate, I think by the Chair, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Another copy, I think, was presented by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] and also referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That is the memorial to which I refer, and not the memorial I have been discussing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not remember about that. The memorial referred to by the Chair is the one on which the Senator is now addressing the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Chair was under a misapprehension. I referred to the memorial I have been speaking about for some time past, prepared by the committee in California, submitted to the State convention in Sacramento, adopted unanimously by the Sacramento convention, and forwarded to the Senate, and a copy of which I hold in my hand.

Now I ask unanimous consent of the Senate, in order to save time, although I regret exceedingly that we have not the time to have some good reader, like my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] or my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], read this memorial for the benefit of the Senate and the country—I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as part of my remarks. If this consent is given, I shall not detain the Senate longer. If it is not given, I shall read the memorial myself as part of my remarks.

Mr. INGALLS. The other day unanimous consent was given upon the application of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to an insertion in the RECORD, without reading, of a memorial purport ing to proceed from the women of Utah. It was a vulgar, profane, obscene, and indecent document; and no further consent will be given, so far as I am concerned, to the insertion of any documents in the RECORD without reading, unless their contents are vouched for by some person who has read them and who declares that they are fit to be read by the American people. I object, Mr. President, to the insertion of this memorial, unread, in the RECORD.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. With the qualification stated by the Senator from Kansas I for one will vouch for this memorial that there is nothing in it indecent; on the contrary, it is one of the ablest, most comprehensive, and dignified papers that I have ever read upon the great question of Chinese immigration to this country. It is one that relates to a question in which all the people of this country are interested. There is nothing in it or about it that could offend even the sensitive ear of my friend from Kansas; and if objection is made I shall proceed to read it myself.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if——

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to remind the presiding officer that 2 o'clock has arrived, the time for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is now before the Senate; but the Senator from Oregon has the floor by the consent of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will get the document into the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask for information, is that the memorial prepared by Mr. Swift?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I make no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I think it is a matter of justice to the people of the State of California and the Pacific coast that this memorial should be printed in some form or at some time.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be printed as a document.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Now as a document, or when?

Mr. HOAR. Now, as a document for the use of the Senate; that is much more convenient for distribution.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I have no objection to have it printed as a document of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon modifies his motion, that this memorial be printed as a document in the ordinary form. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order to print will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I now give way to the regular order, and thank the gentlemen who have given way to me, first moving to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations the memorial of the Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of New York.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves, pending the regular order, to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I will yield to the Senator from Vermont.

THE FREE STATE OF CONGO.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be furnished to the Senate a copy of any report or reports made by any officer of the United States touching the condition of affairs in the Free State of Congo that may be in the possession of any of the Executive Departments of the Government, and which may not have been already communicated to either House of Congress.

LANDING OF CHINESE EMBASSY AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, requested, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession touching the circumstances attending the arrival and landing of the Chinese embassy recently at San Francisco, together with a copy of any correspondence that may have taken place on the subject.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. CULLOM. Before the motion is put I desire to inquire of the Senator—as I understand under the rules appropriation bills have the right of way—how long he supposes it will take for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill? I understand I have to give way if the Senator insists, but I very much regret that the discussion of the interstate-commerce bill had on yesterday is not to be renewed until after a delay. I hope the Senate will allow the consideration of this bill, after the appropriation bill is disposed of, to proceed until it is finished. I am very anxious myself soon to be absent from the Senate for a few days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, not that it be displaced by the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside with a view to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Is there any objection? The Chair

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," in section 1, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building on Capitol Hill for use as a branch of the Washington city post-office, at a rate not exceeding $30 per month, until further action of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 1, line 31, after the word "cents," to insert "$40,000 of which may be used, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, for the establishment, under existing law, of the free-delivery system in cities where it is not now established;" so as to make the clause read:

For free-delivery service, $4,928,531.25; $40,000 of which may be used, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, for the establishment, under existing law, of the free-delivery system in cities where it is not now established.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General," in section 1, line 47, after the word "dollars," at the end of the clause appropriating $575,000 for "inland transportation by steamboat routes," to insert:

The Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for inland and foreign steamboat mail service, when it can be combined in one route, where the foreign office or offices are not more than two hundred miles distant from the domestic office, on the same terms and conditions as inland steamboat service, and pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland steamboat service; said contracts to be made with and performed by American built and registered steamships, at a rate not to exceed fifty cents per nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points.

Mr. PLUMB. That amendment, with the exception of the last clause, is a repetition of the language found in a similar place in the Post-Office appropriation bill of last year. It is designed to cover the service between Tampa, in Florida, and Havana, in Cuba, a portion of which is coastwise service, and the remainder of which, from Key West to Havana, is foreign service. For the purpose of expediting the mails and not leaving the service between Key West and Havana, a shorter distance, under the inhibition and burdens of the existing law with reference to the transportation of foreign mails, the committee, on the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, last year inserted this provision, except so much as relates to the rate of pay. The committee recommend that the provision be changed this year by limiting the rate of pay to 50 cents a nautical mile for each mile traveled going and coming.

Mr. BECK. I only rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from Kansas, as this brings up perhaps the question involved in the amendment from line 100 to line 114, to allow the amendment to be passed over without prejudice until the rest of the bill is through, and let this be looked into afterward.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky asks that the amendment be passed over informally. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 70, to increase the appropriation for "necessary and special facilities on trunk lines" from $251,725.82 to $291,000.

Mr. PLUMB. The money which has heretofore been appropriated for this service has been expended according to a table which I will send to the desk and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD. The bulk of it has been spent for a fast service between the city of Springfield, Mass., and the city of Jacksonville, Fla. The Boston mail arrives at Springfield at an hour which makes it possible by expediting the service to take it up in such a way as to carry it to New York, at which point it intercepts what is called the newspaper train, and from there it is carried by service which has been expedited to the city of Jacksonville, in the State of Florida, the time between New York and Jacksonville being thirty-two hours. That sum has been paid for two years, and the Department recommends that it be kept up.

Since the passage of the last act a completed railroad service has been established between Jacksonville and Tampa. Heretofore the mail was carried up the Saint John's River from Jacksonville to Sanford, where it was placed upon a narrow-gauge railroad extending to Tampa. In the mean time, as I have said, the railroad has been completed clear through.

Mr. INGALLS. A broad-gauge?

Mr. PLUMB. It is not a broad-gauge now, but it will be on the 1st day of July. The gauge is to be changed. The gauge of all the railroads South, now 5 feet, is to be changed to what is known as the standard gauge between now and the 1st day of July, so as to make a uniform gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches all over the United States; that is the standard gauge.

One of the impelling causes to the making of this appropriation originally was to shorten the service between New York and Havana. The completion of this link of railroad between Jacksonville and Tampa the committee thought likely would enable the Postmaster-General to materially shorten the time. The service now is about ninety hours from Havana to New York. If an arrangement can be made whereby the mails can arrive in Jacksonville four hours earlier, they can be carried from New York to Havana in sixty-two hours, which will make a very material saving and be something very important to the interests which are to be subserved by the rapid transit of the mail.

We had official information, or information in its nature official, that the Cuban authorities are now contemplating subsidizing or giving extra pay to a line of steamers between Cuba and Tampa under American management, and that it is their expectation to send their outward foreign mail via this line to New York, to be there transmitted to the ports of foreign destination. The sum of $40,000 was added for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster-General to shorten the time between New York and Tampa in such a way that the boat carrying the mails from there to Havana could leave Tampa not later than 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening and arrive at Havana before sunset on the following evening, thereby, as I said, making a schedule between New York and Havana of about sixty-two hours.

If this purpose can not be accomplished, I think I am safe in saying that the committee felt as though no portion of the service was now materially to be maintained; but there seemed to be a reasonable expectation that this might be done, and the item was inserted, leaving the whole matter to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster-General with a view of accomplishing this purpose, just as heretofore it has been left to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to have a paper inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. PLUMB. I ask to have a table inserted in the RECORD for information, relating to the manner in which the money is given for this service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the table will be inserted.

The table is as follows:

* Part.

Mr. BECK. Has the amendment been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been acted upon. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. If the purpose anticipated by some members of the committee can be carried out I see no objection to the appropriation, and perhaps, as it is in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, there can be no harm done; but all the information we had, so far as it impressed itself upon me, was that it would be impossible to accomplish the result desired. The mails starting from New York in the morning at the hour they do might perhaps reach Jacksonville half an hour or an hour earlier than now, but until very great improvements are made they can not reach Tampa so as to leave there in time to get to Havana before the next night, and they can not land after sundown in Cuba.

Mr. FRYE. How far is Tampa from Havana?

Mr. BECK. It is 240 miles, according to my recollection. The mails reach there now at 9 o'clock at night, and the boat stays there until the next morning. I do not believe that with the present steamboat facilities from Tampa to Havana it is possible to reach Tampa in time for the boats to leave that night, because there is some difficult navigation in the Tampa Bay, 22 hours being about the minimum and 24 hours the ordinary trip across.

I was rather inclined to think that it would be impossible to do what the committee seemed to desire and what perhaps we all desire. If it can be done in that way and the people of Cuba could be induced to send their mails over our line and supply Charleston, Savannah, Jacksonville, and the intermediate towns direct from Havana instead of, as now, going direct from New York and coming all the way back, which makes a good deal of delay, the object is worthy of effort.

I only desire to say that while I do not oppose the amendment, I doubt whether it is possible to improve that service even by the additional facilities we propose to give. If it can be done the object is a good one. I think the chairman of the committee, and perhaps the Senator in charge of the bill himself, had grave doubts as to the possibility of its being done.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that since the committee acted upon the bill I have seen people who have personally administered the line from Washington south, and they assure me that there will be no trouble at all in making the time between New York and Jacksonville enough shorter to enable the mail to arrive at Tampa in time to get out the same evening. So I am now more satisfied than ever that the object which the committee has in view will be accomplished.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say a word in reference to this matter, inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky has somewhat expressed my own view with regard to it. I do not object to this appropriation, and I think it will be an excellent appropriation of the public money if what is proposed can be carried out; but it ought to be distinctly understood that this money is not to be used unless what is proposed can be carried out. We are now paying $251,000 for expediting the mails chiefly between Philadelphia and Jacksonville, these mails being taken up at Philadelphia by a train which leaves New York at 4.45 in the morning and which arrives at Jacksonville at 12 o'clock noon on the following day, making the trip thirty-two hours from New York city. I do not very well see myself how the time of starting from New York city can be changed, as that is the train which carries the newspapers to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, arriving here about 11 o'clock in the morning. The time perhaps could be shortened three-quarters of an hour or possibly an hour in New York city; but it is necessary that this through line shall reach Tampa before sundown on the following day after leaving New York.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the time now?

Mr. ALLISON. It now takes nine hours from Jacksonville to Tampa, at, I think, from twenty-seven to thirty miles an hour. So it will be necessary for the train which leaves New York, say at 4 o'clock in the morning, to reach Tampa before sundown the next day, because the boats can not leave the harbor at Tampa, I understand, except during daylight. That was the statement made to the committee. They can not enter the harbor of Havana after sundown.

So this appropriation is made with the idea and understanding that in order to use it at all the Department must accomplish what I have just stated, namely, the mails must reach Tampa on the evening of the second day in time for the steamer to depart from Tampa to Havana before dark. If that can be accomplished, I think it is a wise thing to expend this additional sum of money to accomplish it; but I do not wish a Postmaster-General or any officer of this Government to suppose that he can use the additional money proposed here unless this is accomplished. I have no reason to suppose that any Postmaster-General would so use it.

There is now but a single vessel between Tampa and Havana. Of course if this money is used, it must involve the supply of additional vessels between Tampa and Havana, which will authorize the daily transmission of mails between these two points in order to justify this expenditure. But we agreed to it because many persons believe it can be accomplished, and if it can be I think it is at least as wise an expenditure of the public money as the expenditure of the $251,000 already in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if it is the intention of the committee that the mails shall not be again carried by steamer, as had been done for a long number of years, from New York to Havana. This appropriation is to be made in furtherance of the operations of the Postmaster-General for the past year in refusing to carry out the direct provision of law appropriating $400,000 for carrying foreign mails upon American steamers. He has undertaken to carry the mails over railways and in fishing smacks and all sorts of vessels he can get to ply from the ports of Florida to Havana, very much to the discomfort and loss of all the business interests of this country.

If after the experience of the past year with the present Postmaster-General in his method of doing business the committee think that under the language which they have added in the amendment the Postmaster-General would carry out their intentions as they have been expressed here by the Senator from Maine and by the Senator from Iowa—if they think it safe to make an appropriation of that kind and leave it entirely in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to do as he pleases with the money whether he succeeds in doing what the committee expect to do or not, for one I have only condemnation for the action of the Postmaster-General in his refusal to carry out the law of Congress, to use the money appropriated in order to carry the mails from New York to Havana. According to the explanation which has been made thus far, I do not see what is to be gained in point of time. It now takes, I understand, three and a half days from New York to Havana by railroad and by steamer from Tampa.

Mr. PLUMB. It takes something over ninety hours.

Mr. MILLER. That is a little more than three days and a half. The sailing time of nearly all the steamers running from New York and other American ports to Havana is now less than that. In fact, I have passed over the line myself in less time than that. In the business being transacted by American merchants with Havana, if their mails are carried in the same steamer that their goods go, they are delivered in time for the business quite as effectually as can be done by any other method of transportation.

Mr. PLUMB. In regard to the service so far as Jacksonville it has been carried on for the past two years in a satisfactory way. It was established partly with the idea of giving to the people living in the important cities along the Atlantic coast line south of Washington an expedited service, and also with a view of shortening the time between New York and Havana. I have no doubt it is true, as the Senator from New York has stated, that sometimes the vessels from New York to Havana make the trip as quickly as it has been made by this combination of railroad and steamship service heretofore, but at the same time I am advised that it is not as uniformly a short schedule as has been furnished by the combination of the land and water line. But now, by reason of the completion of the gap in the railroad between Jacksonville and Tampa, it seems to me that we reach a possibility of getting a service which will be much less than any steamboat service heretofore has been.

Being in the line of that which the Department has heretofore been paying, the committee felt that it was entirely safe to give the Postmaster-General this extra money now, and that he would use it only for the purpose of making the expedition which has been spoken of and which we believe to be within reach. If we can get this service between New York and Havana in sixty-two hours, which is not only of great importance to the terminal points but of great importance also to the intermediate section of the country, the committee had some reason to believe that we should receive by reason of the transportation of the Cuban mail bound for European ports enough money to make up the extra compensation which we place in the bill to pay for the expedited schedule. The question upon which the Senator from New York touches will come up directly on another amendment to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I do not object to any railroad postal facilities of any kind, but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Postmaster-General pays precisely the same for carrying the mails from Tampa to Havana that he pays for carrying the mails from New York to Havana, so that all the pay on the railroad is so much increased expense.

Mr. PLUMB. If that results in an increased rapidity of service, then the result aimed to be accomplished by the appropriation has been realized.

Mr. FRYE. I should not object to it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the object of this appropriation is to concentrate the mails from the West Indies, which now go to Europe by subsidized vessels of the Spanish Government, through the United States and by steamship mail service from New York to Europe. It is estimated upon very reasonable probability that the compensation of that increased mail, the whole of which will go by this route, because several days will be saved by it over any other possible route, will pay the increased cost of this transportation. That is the estimate, besides the commercial advantages of an immediate and expeditious intercourse with the island of Cuba. There are at this time several millions of dollars of imported values from Cuba to this country in the shape of tobacco and in connection with the domestic manufacture of cigars. There is much revenue derived by the Government from that trade, and it will be very largely increased. There is very considerable trade between this country and Cuba in cattle and in various productions, all of which will be largely advanced by this speedy and expeditious intercourse, besides the amount of travel that will pass through the United States on this new and rapid line.

Senators are mistaken when they doubt the practicability of this provision. There is no kind of difficulty about it. The objection is made that at Tampa there is some difficulty in the exit from the harbor after dark. There is, however, as will be perceptible to any one, no difficulty in a ship dropping down some 10 miles below the harbor in deep water, where she may at all hours of the night pass out. The only thing required, with the present facilities expedited as they will be by this bill, if the mail should not get there until 8 or 9 o'clock, will be that the vessel shall leave within an hour after the arrival at Tampa by dropping down some 10 miles. The ordinary time of a fast steamer—and the steamer that is now upon the route doing the service will be supplemented by others, of course—is twenty hours. The average time will be twenty hours, leaving a margin of from three to four hours in which to arrive at the port of Havana, which can not be entered according to the regulations of the island after dark. So there is no doubt about the practicability of it and no doubt about the great advantages of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment again.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 70 and 71, strike out the words "fifty-one thousand seven hundred and twenty-five dollars and eighty-two cents" and insert "ninety-one thousand dollars;" so as to read:

Necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, $291,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99, to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage, of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. BECK. I desire to submit to the Chair whether the provision authorizing the contracts made with American-built steamships for a term of five years at a rate of compensation not exceeding $1 per nautical mile of distance is not new legislation and such as is subject to the point of order. I shall at least raise that question and ask the decision of the Chair upon it.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he would not just as soon interpose the point of order at a later hour?

Mr. BECK. I should be very glad to do that. Indeed, owing to the absence this morning from the city, as I understood, of the Senator from Kansas in charge of the bill, some data that I expected to use in the discussion of this question I did not bring with me to-day. If we could finish the interstate-commerce bill to-day so that I might have until to-morrow morning to look into this particular question I should be very much obliged. But the interstate-commerce bill perhaps could not be finished to-day. I desire to be heard on this amendment, and I think I should take less time if I had a chance to look at the question more fully than perhaps I could do now if I should ramble through some reports, one of which I only got this morning, and of which I furnished a copy to the Senator who has charge of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. For the purpose of meeting the suggestion which the Senator from Kentucky has made, I proposed that the point of order go over in order that the other debate might occur now. I should be very glad indeed to allow the bill to go over until to-morrow if I could be certain that I should not be obliged to contend for the floor to-morrow and with just as much chance of losing it then as I had to-day. Not being able to make an arrangement, therefore I felt that I ought to carry out the purpose of the committee. If the Senator does not interpose his point of order now, some portion of the discussion favorable to the amendment at least will occur to-day, and he will have the benefit of the debate as well as the benefit of getting the data which he lacks.

Mr. BECK. I am willing to waive anything except that. I do not feel quite able to discuss the question as pointedly and as briefly to-day as I should if I had until morning. All that is desired to be said by others I should be very glad to hear this afternoon, hoping that the bill may not be concluded until to-morrow morning.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state what his point of order is?

Mr. BECK. I have withdrawn it. I desire to make the point of order that the proposed contract being for five years, limited to American-built ships, this is new legislation. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator from Kentucky raise this point of order on the five years' contract?

Mr. BECK. Also on the fact that it is confined to a certain class of ships to which it has not heretofore been confined. Those are the two questions which I shall make.

Mr. HARRIS. That it is new legislation?

Mr. BECK. That it is new legislation on an appropriation bill. But I waive the point of order for the present for the purpose of hearing all that may be said, as the Senator in charge of the bill suggests. I should be very glad to hear the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and I am willing to withdraw the points of order. The Senator from Maine is chairman of the Committee on Rules, of which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is a member, and I believe it is pretty well known that I am not an expert on rules. What I desire is not to be obliged to close the debate on this question this evening, for I could be heard more satisfactorily and take less time in the morning after I procure some documents which I did not bring to-day, thinking the appropriation bill would not come up.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maine does not wish to be heard. He has discussed the general merits of the question presented so many times on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House that he has no ambition to discuss it further, and will not do so unless something in the progress of the debate or something touching the point of order shall be raised which shall, in his opinion, require his discussion of it.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine will observe that the amendment reported by the committee is a very pronounced modification of the amendment offered by himself, and it was for that reason I presumed that the Senator from Maine would desire to be heard. I did not desire to invite any discussion by the Senator from Maine, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky to insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BECK. I do not. It has been waived at the request of the Senator in charge of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky will at a later period interpose his point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. It is understood that the Senator from Kentucky reserves the right hereafter to make the point of order upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands. The Chair supposed he had made that reservation.

Mr. HARRIS. But for the present he has withdrawn it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order can be raised at any time. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. FRYE. I do not intend to discuss this question, but I wish to make a very few suggestions, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] intends to reply to-morrow.

There is a very singular condition of things in the country to-day. There is a great confusion, a kind of a daze, among the laboring men of the Republic, and you hear of strikes and riots and boycotts and all manner of disturbances, and Congress hastens to afford relief. The national House of Representatives passes a bill providing for arbitration; the Senate is ready to take up and pass another, and the President of the United States sends us a message suggesting that provision be made for a board of arbitrators. Now, sir, all this does no harm. The bill of the House, the bill which the Senate will pass, the recommendation of the President, are all entirely harmless. They are, however, giving brown-bread pills to a fever patient. That is all. The medicine does not strike at the root of the disease in the least particular.

Now what is the disease? Carroll D. Wright, your Labor Commissioner, in his recent report, says that there are one million of men in the United States to-day out of work. There is the disease, if he is right. You take the Knights of Labor, for instance, to-day in any State. They stop work. They have a right to do it; nobody questions the right; but to their utter amazement they see just as many men ready to take their places. Then come serious temptations to induce the men ready to take their places not to take them. Then what? Very likely among the more violent there comes a riot, a violation of law, an appeal to the courts, an appeal perhaps to arms, and men, it may be, are slaughtered. How happens it that when there is a strike, as it is called, there are enough men to fill the places of those who have struck? It comes from the fact that you produce to-day from your farms and your mines and your manufactories more than you can use. There is the disease. It comes from the fact that you raised last year, from farms, mines, factories, and forests, fifteen billions of dollars' worth of products and that you exported but 2 per cent. of the whole. It comes from the fact that your people can not consume those fifteen billion dollars' worth; and when the men made idle complain your reply is arbitration, the Senate reply will be arbitration, and the President's is a commission of arbitration! These skilled laborers are men of intelligence, and are not to be cheated by any such harmless nostrums; when they ask bread they will not be content with a stone.

Why, sir, I hate to start the Senator from Kentucky on a tariff speech, though I know it is a good one that he will make; but I can not help giving him a word or two of suggestion in that direction. It is said that the President of the United States is undertaking to pass through the House of Representatives the Morrison tariff bill. Whether it is true or not, I do not know. We imported last year from Great Britain $37,000,000 worth of cotton goods, and we raised the cotton here. Every single dollar's worth of those thirty-seven millions could just as well have been made in the United States of America as in Europe, and if they had been, one hundred thousand of these men out of work would not have been idle.

In 1883 you forced us to reduce the duties on those goods from 16 to 33 per cent., and an increased importation followed. The present Morrison tariff bill proposes to cut the duties down from 16 per cent. to 33 per cent. more, and if it becomes a law you will import instead of $37,000,000 worth $75,000,000 I think, and you will turn out of employment two hundred thousand more men to engage in strikes. And yet the President in one hand offers a message to heal labor troubles by arbitration, and in the other hand a demand on the House of Representatives that they shall turn out of work two, or three, or five hundred thousand more American laborers.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me? I desire to help him along with his speech.

Mr. FRYE. I do not need any help.

Mr. BECK. But this is in his line. All commerce is recognized now, I believe, to be proper. Great Britain takes from us now of our exports $500,000,000 a year and sells us $150,000,000. What has she got to say about that surplus if we are grumbling in that condition of trade?

Mr. FRYE. I will not now reply to that. I have heard that question discussed on this floor by the Senator from Kentucky every year since I have been here, and I heard it, too, in the House of Representatives long before I came. I want to go one single step further with my illustration, and the Senator will reply to it to-morrow.

We imported last year forty-three million dollars' worth of woolen goods, every dollar of which could have been made in our own Republic just as well. We imported about forty million dollars' worth of iron and steel manufactures, every dollar of which might have been made here. We imported nineteen million dollars' worth of linen goods and eight million dollars' worth of manufactures of jute, about thirty-seven million dollars' worth of silks, and we could have made them here. And if we had, Carroll D. Wright could not have reported that one million of men in the United States were out of employment—not by any manner of means. Five hundred thousand more men would have been at work, and the President of the United States would not have been called upon to deliver a message to the Congress recommending a commission to arbitrate. Mr. President, it is worse than useless to bring the healing of arbitration in one hand and the infinitely worse disease of free trade in the other.

But, sir, I did not intend to discuss the tariff when I rose. I say the trouble among our laborers to-day comes from a surplus. What are you going to do with it? You must get rid of it somehow and somewhere. Your wheat may, as the Senator from Kentucky suggests, go to Great Britain. That is not the only product. There are your cotton, woolen, and silk goods; your manufactures of iron and steel. How are you to get rid of the surplus of them? Send them to Great Britain? We have a surplus of ten and she has a surplus of one hundred. Send them to France? There the same is true. She has a surplus and a tariff too. Send them to Russia? She has a tariff. Send them to Germany? She has a tariff. Where will you send them? You must find a market for them somewhere, or there will be idle men and labor troubles too.

The only countries you have for markets are right here by your very doors, right here on your borders, sister republics formed after the likeness of our own; in full sympathy with our Republic, with our purposes, with our civilization, and with our designs for the future, willing to trade, anxious to model after us, even adorning their parks with the statues of our Washington and of our Lincoln. Take the Argentine Republic, to-day growing as rapidly as the United States, having as large an immigration in proportion to her inhabitants as the United States to-day, with a splendid climate, a fertile soil, a good people, divided into states, and every state equipped with a normal school modeled on ours in New England, and in every normal school a teacher from the United States at the head, instructing with all their might and all their energy in the lessons of our civilization. The Argentine Republic appropriated last year $59,000,000 to railroads alone, and is building them from that appropriation to-day. Is not this progress?

Let me show you what the increase has been in importations of this republic. In 1876 their imports were $36,000,000; in 1884 they were $80,000,000, more than doubling since 1876. Where do they come from? From England, France, and Germany, all but about $6,000,000. What were they? All manufactured goods, the whole of them. What, principally? Cotton goods largely, and the South can furnish the whole of the Central American and South American states with all the cotton goods they want to use, cheaper than Great Britain can place them there to-day.

Mr. BECK. Why do they not buy them here?

Mr. FRYE. I will tell the Senator. They do not buy them here because the Senator from Kentucky like a watch-dog stands between the Treasury and an honest payment for carrying the United States mails to the Argentine Republic.

Mr. BECK. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. FRYE. Not now; I want to finish that answer. The Argentine Republic appropriated $96,000 three years ago to carry her mails from her country to the United States and it has been a standing offer since, and the United States, because the Senator from Kentucky and the Democratic party of the House and the Postmaster-General stand directly athwart progress, refuses to pay over $2,000 for carrying our mails to the Argentine Republic, and we have no mail there, and the American flag last year was not in sight of the coast of that republic. Why, sir, there were over two hundred steamers of Germany, France, and England in the waters of the Argentine Republic last year, and not a single American ship or American flag, and yet with an importation of $80,000,000, every dollar of which we could supply her with and thus employ two or three hundred thousand of the men the Senator from Kentucky is so anxious about. We have not a single line of steamers there. The Brazilian line is building three ships to-day, and if the Senator from Kentucky would permit this amendment to become a law those three ships within sixty days would be running to the Argentine Republic and there would be a communication opened which would result in our getting our fair share of that trade. Now I will yield.

Mr. BECK. I will not interrupt the Senator from Maine any more. I rose to tell him why England had the trade; and his mails and his letters and his subsidies are worse than brown-bread pills.

Mr. FRYE. I know just what the Senator would tell me.

Mr. BECK. I will tell you.

Mr. FRYE. I know it perfectly and will wait until to-morrow to hear it.

Mr. BECK. I can tell in a word.

Mr. FRYE. Very well; let us have it.

Mr. BECK. We can make goods as cheap as England so the Senator says, but England carries her goods to the Argentine Republic and she takes their copper, she takes their wool, she takes everything they have got and lands it in her own ports and sets her people to work to make more. They have no money. We will not take their goods. We have got to take what they have got, and if they can not buy of us because of a miserable war tariff of 46 per cent. that prevents our people from landing the goods they are willing to give us and that England takes and lands and puts her own people to work upon to manufacture more, they resort to England. That is why; and it is not mails, and it is not subsidies at all, that will supply a remedy.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator knows that Great Britain last year paid more money for carrying her mails—if he calls it subsidizing, I will say for subsidizing her steamship lines to South and Central America than the United States pays in any two years for the carrying of all her mails the world over. She paid last year $1,700,000 for her mails to China and Japan and Australia, and we paid $11,000. That is the reason Great Britain has facilities when we do not have them, and the Senator from Kentucky knows it well.

What would it amount to to establish one line? I say that one line to the Argentine Republic, with two steamers a month, is worth more to this Republic than your $800,000 contained in this amendment. I say it is worth more to laboring men than all the arbitration bills these two Houses will pass; and it is no statesmanship to talk about labor unless you are ready to do that which will relieve it and send the surplus you have in this country abroad and thus employ the men who are idle. Fair mail pay—the same you pay stages—will insure direct communication with these republics.

Why, sir, a man whom it is hardly safe to mention in the United States Senate, John Roach, one of the honestest men and one of the ablest I ever saw in my life, a man who is an honor to this Republic and who has done more to keep our flag on the ocean than any other living man—John Roach put on a line to Brazil. Dom Pedro paid him $125,000 a year for carrying the Brazilian mail to New York, while you paid him about $6,000 for carrying the United States mail to Brazil. Dom Pedro withdrew, of course, his mail pay, and John Roach's line was withdrawn. Now there is one line to Brazil, and that line has been carrying your mail all down through that section of country to the islands in the sea where other steamship lines would not carry them, and trusting to what for pay? To the Postmaster-General? No, to Congress.

The Postmaster-General could pay them 5 cents a letter or 4 cents a mile. He can pay for carrying the mails from San Francisco to Sitka 60 cents per mile. He can do that, but he can not pay for carrying the mail down to Rio de Janeiro over 3 cents per mile, or at the outside 4½, provided you included both sea and inland postage. Increase the pay to this Brazilian line, and, according to the logic of the Senator, it is a subsidy, but only fair mail pay from San Francisco to Alaska!

They are paying $100,000 a year for carrying their mail up here and you are paying about $4,000 a year for carrying your mail down there. How long that sort of a copartnership will last I do not know. One of these vessels sailed a few days ago. I wish to show what a vessel of that kind does for the United States of America. Does the Senator from Kentucky think that his State has no sort of interest in this steamship line? But this one steamer sailing a fortnight ago took of the manufactured products of the United States $262,000 worth in one cargo, one voyage. I have the manifest in my hands.

Why, sir, it took $20,000 worth of cotton goods from the Senator from Georgia's State, jeans and cheap cottons. The mills there were running low, the hands were getting out of employment, and the agent of the Brazilian steamship line went down there, inspected those mills and looked at their goods. Said he: "Gentlemen, you are making just the goods for Brazil; they can be sold there without difficulty; you just put them up into such and such packages of a size that they can be carried on mule-back, and I will take $20,000 of those goods on the very next steamer that sails;" and he took the $20,000 worth, and thus afforded just so much more room for the laboring men of Atlanta. That leaves $20,000 to make up there in Georgia. Here on the manifest is gutta-percha, here are medicines, here are surveying instruments, books, stationery, lamps, plated ware, car wheels, locomotive tools, cigars, organs, granite ware, every conceivable manufacture of the United States. Kentucky contributed, I see, to the cargo.

North Carolina, I think, is mentioned five times, and her manufactures and the products of her soil were taken in the same way. I see in the list corn-shellers, metal buttons, sewing-machines, cotton goods, woolen goods, shoe blacking, fur goods, cotton undershirts, cotton cards, spool silk, silk ribbons, undershirts, sheeting, cold cotton, printed cotton, corn-starch, petroleum, stoves, cases of pumps, clocks, twenty-five bags corn-starch, one hundred and fifty barrels of flour, ninety-eight spools of wire—every conceivable thing that we make in this country is on that one single ship, $262,000 worth in all. If that American ship had not taken to Rio de Janeiro the $262,000 worth of goods they would have remained at home, and perhaps three or four hundred men and women would have been out of employment on account of this amount of surplus.

The next week another ship sails with a like cargo, and the next another, and so on. That line wants pay for taking the mail down to the Argentine Republic. They are building one vessel now and ready to build two more, ready to double the service if only you will pay half what you pay from San Francisco to Sitka; but the Senator from Kentucky says, "No; not if we can hire a British ship to carry it cheaper!"

I call attention to Uruguay. It is filling up as rapidly as the Argentine Republic. Take Chili. The imports into Chili have tripled since 1876, and your flag is never seen in her ports. Your flag never is seen in Uruguay. Why is it, Mr. President, that this great Republic should sit here quietly and see itself full of disturbance, East and West, North and South, labor troubles, men wanting to work and not able to get work, men struggling, men rioting because you have so much surplus that you can not employ them longer?

Why should this great Republic, with its 50,000,000 people and its immense stores of wealth, waste itself on this trifling talk about arbitration and commission and permit itself to be prevented from doing that which every man will say is honest, paying fair and reasonable prices for carrying United States mails to the South and Central American republics and thus opening up a communication which is direct and which shall be speedy between our manufacturers and their consumers? Forty-five million of people, importing annually more than $400,000,000 of the very goods we make and must sell, anxious to purchase of us, and yet we refuse to pay that reasonable mail pay which would establish lines of steamers and open up these markets to us!

Everything they raise there we want. We paid Brazil $50,000,000 last year for coffee—twice as much as Great Britain paid, twice as much as any other country—brought it in foreign ships into our ports, and sold Brazil $8,000,000 of our products, principally petroleum, an article she can not get anywhere else, and she bought all the rest of her goods of Great Britain. If we buy $50,000,000 of coffee, twice as much as Great Britain buys of her, why should she not seek to buy of us? She can not, because we had but this one line, and that only for a short time; no adequate, direct, and speedy steam communication. If we wish to export our goods, we must ship them from New York to Liverpool on an English steamer, and then they are reshipped in Liverpool, and perhaps kept on the dock for a month or two, our English friends being in no haste, then forwarded to Rio in another English steamer. What chance does this open for trade? Four-fifths of the cotton goods sold in South and Central America to-day coming from Great Britain are marked "American manufactures," to give the idea that they are really products of our looms.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say nearly so much as I have. I preferred very much to reply to the Senator from Kentucky, but I have thrown out two or three suggestions which will give him a splendid opportunity to make one of his best speeches, and then perhaps I may take the floor again to reply.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps I will not speak at all in view of that alarming statement.

Mr. FRYE. I did not intend to frighten the Senator from Kentucky. I know where he came from, and it is utterly impossible to do that.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will yield to me, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I hope not. We were told that this bill was to be finished this afternoon. We ought not to waste this day.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken about the Senate being told any such thing. The Senator from Kansas requested me to waive the question of order on this amendment so that he could be heard this afternoon and we could take up the question in the morning.

Mr. HOAR. When the Senator from Kansas called up the Post-Office appropriation bill he was inquired of as to how long it would probably occupy. He answered in my hearing, though not in the hearing of the Senator from Kentucky I believe, that he hoped to get it finished this afternoon. That is what I refer to.

Mr. BECK. I suppose there is no sort of chance of closing it this afternoon.

Mr. HOAR. There is a great mass of very important public business awaiting the Senate, which would take us two or three solid months, and every afternoon that we stop business at 4 or half past 4 we cut off some important public measure that the people are demanding and leave it untouched at the present session.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with the convenience of the Senator from Kentucky. If he does not want to go on this afternoon, let us take up——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate gave up this afternoon——

Mr. DAWES. I suggest that we resume the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. HOAR. We can resume the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. HARRIS. We can profitably employ this afternoon——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the whole thing can be easily arranged in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Tennessee. Three or four Senators are addressing each other and not addressing the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to yield to me, and I desire to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we can very profitably employ the remainder of this evening, even if not engaged in legislative business, and therefore I hope he will not object to the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if he will withdraw that motion for a moment. I desire to submit to the Senate the question of taking up by unanimous consent the bill (S. 2225) to indemnify certain subjects of the Chinese Empire for losses sustained by the violence of a mob at Rock Springs, in the Territory of Wyoming, in September, 1885.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennesse withdraw his motion for the present?

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Alabama propose simply to offer a resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I propose to take up by unanimous consent a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It will take but a short time to dispose of it.

Mr. CULLOM. The unfinished business was laid aside informally in order that the Post-Office appropriation bill might be considered to-day. I hope the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will vote that motion down, and that we shall proceed with the consideration of the interstate commerce bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not necessary to inform the Senate that the motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM and Mr. HOAR called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], and I am in doubt about the propriety of voting. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. SABIN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire if the motion is carried whether, when the appropriation bill is finished, the unfinished business, which was informally laid aside, will be the regular order?

Mr. INGALLS and others. Of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the regular order after the Post-Office appropriation bill, unless the Senate should interpose with some other order.

Mr. PLATT. As the business of the Senate stands now it would be the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 22; as follows:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1013) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine; and

A bill (S. 1397) to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 71) for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. TUCKER, and Mr. CASWELL managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots," approved April 17, 1874;

A bill (H. R. 1500) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district;

A bill (H. R. 2646) granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 4063) to authorize the improvement of the water-power in the Mississippi River at Little Falls, Minn.; and

A bill (H. R. 4616) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate this 28th day of April, 1886.

CONSULS OF THE UNITED STATES.

E. H. Bryan, of California, to be consul of the United States at Lyons, the nomination of M. J. Newmark heretofore sent to the Senate for consul at that place being this day withdrawn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I made a report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bill (H. R. 4460) to pension John W. Delp. That report was made in error, and I ask unanimous consent now to withdraw it.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have an erroneous reference to one of the Calendars changed. I find that House bill No. 5868, to construct a road to the national cemetery at Knoxville, Tenn., reported on February 16 from the Committee on Military Affairs, has been placed upon the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directed its reference to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUK. I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where it properly belongs, as of date February 16; that is to say, immediately following the bill H. R. No. 4915 on that Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

DRAWBACK ON IMPORTED COAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting a report of the effect and operations of the provision of law under which a drawback is allowed on imported bituminous coal used as fuel on steam-vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

POTOMAC RIVER FLATS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bill No. 335, to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats in the District of Columbia, with amendments by the House of Representatives non-concurred in by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the order of the Senate on said bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 26, 1886.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. INGALLS, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. VEST be appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the request of the Senate for a conference.

The request of the Senate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the conferees on the part of the House hereafter.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 71) for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory, with amendments by the House of Representatives non-concurred in by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the order of the Senate on said bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 24, 1886.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. DOLPH, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr GRAY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, that bill came from the Judiciary Committee of the House, and is under the charge of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. In his absence, as I do not see him in his seat, I will ask the appointment of the conferees on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the House will agree to the request of the Senate, and order conferees to be appointed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. TUCKER, and Mr. CASWELL as conferees on the part of the House on said bill.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 1101) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Round Valley, reservation in the State of California—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 1868) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon—to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for two weeks from the 28th instant.

To Mr. NEGLEY, indefinitely.

To Mr. BAYNE, for Wednesday and Thursday of this week.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations;

A bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 6980) making appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn.

MAJ. MICHAEL P. SMALL.

Mr. FINDLAY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4616) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small, and that the same be brought before the House for present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Maj. Michael P. Small, commissary of subsistence, United States Army, are hereby directed to credit said Maj. Michael P. Small, commissary of subsistence, United States Army, with the sum of $3,780.53, being the amount of Government funds which were stolen or embezzled from him, without his default, at or near Chicago, Ill., in the years 1879 and 1880; and in case the said Small shall have paid into the Treasury of the United States, prior to the passage of this act, any part of the said sum so stolen or embezzled, such amount shall be refunded to him in full out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COX. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. FINDLAY. With the permission of the House I will make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Indiana will be permitted to make a brief explanation.

Mr. FINDLAY. This is a bill for the relief of General Small, who was for a long time, and is now, a commissary in the United States Army. A trusted and confidential clerk, who had been in his employ for some ten years, robbed him of some $3,780 of Government funds in his charge. This clerk afterward made confession. The case was tried in the United States district court in New York by civil action and judgment for the full amount was recovered. A criminal action could not be instituted by reason of the fact that the statute of limitations had begun to run.

This is simply a bill now to relieve General Small from a charge for that amount of money upon the books of the Treasury. It was alleged in the petition of the United States and proven that this robbery was without any neglect on the part of General Small, and that he was not guilty of any negligence in any shape or form. That was part of the allegation of the United States and of course a part of the proof. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. There was no reason that the committee could see why General Small should not be relieved of this charge. It is simply a charge upon the books of the Treasury against him; and the bill provides he shall receive credit for that amount.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FINDLAY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7087, and that the same be brought before the House for present consideration.

Mr. BEACH. With all respect, I think the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER] has had his due share of recognition in this Congress. He has already got four or five bills passed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. BEACH. I shall object to this until other members have had a chance.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up House resolution——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BURLEIGH] demands the regular order, which cuts off all requests for unanimous consent.

SUBSTITUTES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution introduced by me more than a week ago, a resolution of inquiry, which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. They have not made a report, and I shall move that they be discharged from its further consideration and that it be considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a privileged motion. The resolution will be read. When was the resolution referred?

Mr. TAULBEE. A week ago last Monday.

The SPEAKER. And it has not been reported?

Mr. TAULBEE. No, sir.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas by a report to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date April 5, 1886, it is shown that quite a number of persons holding positions as employés in the Treasury Department are carried on the rolls of employés and not required to perform any service, and whose places are filled by substitutes designated to positions within the classified civil service, and who have not been certified for appointment to said positions by the United States Civil Service Commission, and who are paid a less rate of compensation than the salary allowed the said regular employés: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House by what authority these practices are had, and by what authority persons are paid salaries when they do not perform any service to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds on examination of the rule that it provides these resolutions "shall" be reported back within a week, not merely that they may be.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is calling on the committee to report?

The SPEAKER. That is all. The committee's report would be privileged at any time that it should be made, notwithstanding the limitation of time in the rule.

Mr. TAULBEE. My motion was not to direct the committee to report. My motion was to discharge the committee from the further consideration of that resolution, and that the House proceed now to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. That was the motion as the gentleman first stated it, and the Chair stated that was not a matter of privilege. The Chair understood that the gentleman next moved to instruct the committee to report, which the Chair thought was a matter of privilege.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will put the motion in that form, that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be directed to report back that resolution.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. TAULBEE. Within this week; by Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be directed to report the resolution back to the House on or before next Saturday.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have not had an opportunity to consider the resolution to which the gentleman refers. The resolution was introduced only a few days ago, and the committee have not had time to consider it, and if required to report on or before Saturday next we would have to call a special meeting. Some of the members of the committee are busy in connection with the river and harbor bill and with the work of other committees, so that we did not have a quorum at the meeting appointed for this morning.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to annoy the committee in any way.

Mr. COX. There is no annoyance at all.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not wish to annoy the committee or to make any motion that would work hardship to them, and I would not have called the attention of the House to this matter at this time but for the fact that a resolution embodying a similar inquiry was introduced by myself more than a month ago and was allowed to sleep in that committee for two weeks and a half. I refrained at that time from calling attention to the matter, believing that the committee was overburdened with work. This resolution was introduced a week ago last Monday, and I was informed on yesterday by a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that they have not had a meeting since the introduction of the resolution, and that the probabilities were that they would not have a quorum present at any meeting for some time to come. In view of these facts, believing it to be my duty to urge the adoption of the resolution by the House, I was driven to this last resort.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, I desire to say that the gentleman [Mr. TAULBEE] is mistaken in his statement that any resolution of inquiry introduced by him has been allowed by that committee to sleep among the papers on file in its committee-room. The first resolution to which the gentleman of Kentucky refers was not reported, I admit, within a week after its introduction; but he well knows the reason, as it was explained to him by myself. The reason was not that we were neglecting the resolution at all; we were taking time to consider it. With regard to his last resolution of inquiry, the committee, it is true, have not yet considered it. As you, Mr. Speaker, and this House well know the committee has had to prosecute an investigation placed in its charge by the House. We have been earnestly endeavoring to bring that investigation to a close, but, on account of the absence of a witness, we have not been able to do so.

A meeting of the committee was called for this morning, but it was found not possible for some reason, I know not why, to obtain a quorum. The committee has no intention whatever of smothering the resolution of inquiry introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, and as soon as we can have a meeting that resolution will be considered and reported, either favorably or adversely, to the House. This much I desire to say in vindication of the committee.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman from Louisiana think he has given a good reason for the failure of the committee to comply with the rule of the House?

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. BLANCHARD] has convinced the House that I was not mistaken in my statement and that I have not misstated the facts. The gentleman himself is the member of the committee who informed me that they had not had a meeting since the introduction of my resolution. I again repeat that the first resolution touching upon this subject which I introduced was allowed to remain two weeks and a half in that committee.

The resolution did not require elaborate investigation in order to determine whether or not the House was entitled to the information called for; neither does this resolution require more than five minutes' consideration by that committee. If the committee has been as diligent as the gentleman claims in the investigation committed to it, how happens it that gentlemen who attack my statement here are compelled, in order to sustain themselves, to make it appear that their committee, by reason of its overwhelming duties in that investigation, has not been able to procure a quorum since the introduction of this resolution? I maintain, Mr. Speaker, upon the gentleman's own statement, that they have manifested a disposition to ignore this inquiry, and I leave to this House to judge of the case.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I had no disposition to challenge the statement which the gentleman made that his first resolution of inquiry was not reported back to this House until after the week provided by the rules; but I do challenge the statement, which I understood to be implied in his remark, that there was a deliberate attempt on the part of the committee not to report back his resolution. Since his last resolution was introduced the committee has had no meeting, and therefore has not been able to pass upon the resolution. To-day was the regular meeting day, but the committee did not have a meeting for the very good reason that there was no quorum present.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe you stated a while ago, as one reason why this resolution had not been considered, that your committee was overburdened with the work of the investigation which was going on before it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] to direct the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report back before Saturday next a resolution of inquiry introduced by him some days ago.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not understand that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service were prevented from considering this resolution by an investigation that was going on, but by one that was not going on. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion is a privileged one under the rule, which requires that resolutions of this character shall be reported back within one week, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] having stated that the resolution was introduced by him more than a week ago.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the investigation with which the House charged the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has not ended. The committee have made repeated efforts to get a witness that is to be examined before them. We had met in the committee-room—not a full meeting of the committee, but certain members, not a quorum, there being a resolution of the committee that those of us who were present should continue that investigation—but have not been able to pursue it even as a subcommittee, because of the failure to obtain that witness.

The only purpose I had in rising was to relieve the committee of the imputation which, as I understood, was placed upon it by the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, that there had been a disposition on the part of the committee to ignore his resolution. That is all the controversy I have or desire to have with the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman's explanation is perfectly satisfactory to me, and I hope it is so to the whole House—that not only this resolution, but the investigation going on before that committee, has fallen into "innocuous desuetude."

Mr. STRUBLE. In other words, it has the Democratic complaint.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND-GRANT FORFEITURES.

Mr. OATES. I rise for the purpose of submitting a report from the Judiciary Committee on a resolution of inquiry directed to that committee.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged matter.

Mr. OATES. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, but was interrupted by

The SPEAKER, who said: This is not a privileged report. The Chair supposed, from the statement of the gentleman, that this was a resolution of inquiry addressed to the head of a Department.

Mr. OATES. I stated exactly what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report already commenced be concluded; it will take but a minute.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the regular order is withdrawn——

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the resolution—I do not know whether this makes it privileged or not—directed that the committee should report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the resolution.

Mr. OATES. The report is very brief, and the reading will take but a moment at any rate.

The SPEAKER. There has been no resolution adopted by the House giving the committee the privilege to report at any time. This resolution was simply referred to the committee, not adopted by the House. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to present this report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear what it is.

The SPEAKER. Is the report accompanied by a resolution?

Mr. OATES. It is. The resolution is reported back with a special report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the following report accompanying the resolution:

In the Forty-seventh and prior Congresses bills for the forfeiture of lands granted to corporations were referred to and considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. But in the Forty-eighth and the present Congress all bills of that class have gone to the Committee on Public Lands.

The resolution herewith reported was referred to your committee for their opinion upon certain questions of law involved in some of the forfeiture bills recommended and reported to this House and now on the Calendar, as to which there is a difference of opinion and disagreement among the members of the Committee on Public Lands. The resolutions have not been adopted by the House, and unless so adopted your committee will not respond to said resolutions. Proper regard for the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands and the courtesy due from one committee to another constrain us to report the resolutions back without recommendation. Should they be adopted by the House, your committee would cheerfully respond with their opinion, but not otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to make this report? The Chair hears none. The report is made, and the resolution referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand that there are no reports to be presented this morning, I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a report. We might make some agreement like that adopted yesterday, that if there are any reports they may be presented.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the formal call of committees, and that gentlemen having reports to present be recognized by the Chair for that purpose.

Mr. OATES. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if there is no further action desired by the House upon the resolution reported back by the Judiciary Committee, the proper disposition would be for it to lie on the table, instead of going to the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. No motion of that sort was made; and, of course, under the rule of the House, the Chair had to refer it to the appropriate Calendar.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer an opportunity to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] who introduced the resolution to move its adoption, if he so desires.

Mr. VAN EATON. I move that the resolution be adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My point is that the resolution is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House for consideration except by unanimous consent——

Mr. VAN EATON. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. And the motion that the resolution lie on the table is consideration of the proposition.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not object to my friend from Mississippi making his statement, but I think it is not necessary to have action on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion that the resolution lie on the table can not be made except by unanimous consent, as that is an appropriate motion when the matter is before the House for consideration. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kansas to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. VAN EATON. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take up the resolution for consideration. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas sundry and divers cases are pending before Congress for the forfeiture of lands heretofore granted by the United States to States and corporations in aid of the construction of railroads and other public improvements; and

Whereas certain legal questions arise in said cases affecting the right of the United States to declare such forfeiture:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to examine and report on the questions of law arising upon the following statement of facts:

1. Where a grant has been made for certain alternate sections of land in aid of the construction of a railroad between certain termini, and it is provided that such road may be constructed in divisions of consecutive miles, and that upon the completion of any such division of consecutive miles the same shall be examined by commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, and that when the said commissioners have made the examination of such division and have reported under oath that the same has been constructed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner and as in all other respects required by the act of Congress making such grant, patents shall issue therefor confirming the right and title to the lands situated opposite and conterminous to said completed sections or divisions, can the United States, after said division has been constructed in conformity with said provision, and after the report of said commissioners has been duly made as required by the act, declare a forfeiture of the lands so reported upon because of any failure of the railroad company to complete other divisions of said road within the time prescribed for the completion of the entire road?

2. In a grant of the character stated in proposition number 1, where the entire road is not completed within the time specified in the grant, but is subsequently constructed, completed, equipped, and furnished to the satisfaction of the commissioners appointed by the United States to make examination thereof, and they have made report of that fact to the President before any act of forfeiture has been declared by the United States, may the United States, subsequent to said completion and report, declare forfeiture for the failure to complete the road within the time specified in the act?

3. If the grant or any part of it was earned by constructing the road after the time limited in the act, but before any forfeiture or re-entry by the Government, does there remain any legal right of forfeiture in the Government?

And that the said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it still within the power of any member to object to this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is; it has merely been read for information.

Mr. RANDALL. Before venturing at present to object, but reserving that right, I wish to ask whether it is proposed that there be joint jurisdiction by two committees over a single subject-matter or a single bill? Is it proposed that the Committee on Public Lands, being authorized to report a bill, should first learn the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary as to the legal aspect and effect of the bill?

Mr. OATES. The report of the Judiciary Committee is——

Mr. HOLMAN. As I believe that the Committee on Public Lands is perfectly competent to decide the questions coming before it, I object to this resolution.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think that is right. The more law the Committee on Public Lands have the more they will be embarrassed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I withhold my objection till my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] can be heard for a moment.

Mr. OATES. I desire to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana misunderstood the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. This resolution offered by the gentleman from Mississippi having been referred to our committee, the committee declines to respond to it unless the House by adopting the resolution should instruct the committee to respond. If the House should see proper to adopt the resolution, then the Judiciary Committee will answer these questions, but not otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I can see this might be an obstruction to the passage of a bill of forfeitures.

Mr. WILLIS. I renew my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague [Mr. COBB] wishes to be heard.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my objection so my colleague can be heard.

Mr. WILLIS. I renew it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call the committees of the House for reports for reference.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask by unanimous consent we waive the formal call of committees, and that gentlemen having reports from committees for reference may be allowed to submit them.

Mr. LONG. It will not save time, and I object for the reason it confuses the record.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3746) making an appropriation for the building of a new light-house at Milwaukee, Wis., and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 6570, a bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter; also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNHAM. If necessary to do so I now reserve all points of order on that bill. I do it now so there may be no mistake about it hereafter.

By unanimous consent House bill No. 6570 was laid on the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, also reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 5720) to protect the producers and consumers of dairy products, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7777) to tax the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine;

A bill (H. R. 3109) to tax the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine;

A bill (H. R. 397) to amend Title XXV, entitled "Internal Revenue," of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 1676) to regulate the exportation of articles made in imitation of butter and cheese;

A bill (H. R. 7302) to prevent deception in the sale of imitation dairy products, and to preserve the public health, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 5597) providing for a revenue tax on all manufactured substitutes for butter and cheese, and imitations of the same, manufactured out of other ingredients than that of pure milk and cream.

JOBES POST, GREENVILLE, OHIO.

Mr. FINDLAY (by Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio), from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5393) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer two condemned cannon to Jobes Post, at Greenville, Ohio, for monumental purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROSER POST, ARCANUM, OHIO.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6643) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer one condemned cannon to Roser Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Arcanum, Ohio, for monumental purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

Mr. MURPHY, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the House Calendar:

Resolved, That Thursday, May 20, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, House bill 5869, to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and if said bill shall not be disposed of on that day, this shall be a continuing order until said bill is disposed of; this order not to interfere with the consideration of revenue and general appropriation bills and all prior special orders.

SAMUEL B. SEAT.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 24) for the relief of Samuel B. Seat, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, reported a resolution setting apart a time for the consideration of business reported by that committee; which was referred to the House Calendar.

INSANE ASYLUM, ARIZONA.

Mr. SPRIGGS, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2812) to approve an act of the Thirteenth Legislative Assembly of Arizona, entitled "An act to establish, maintain, and provide for the government of an insane asylum," approved March 9, 1885; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes, and the call rests with the Committee on Commerce.

PORT OF TRENTON, N. J.

Mr. REAGAN. I take the floor and yield it to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL].

Mr. O'FERRALL. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1500) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas, after the constituting of the port of Lamberton, in the collection district of Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, the borough of Lamberton, where such port is situated, was incorporated into and became a part of the city of Trenton, in said State: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the port now known as the port of Lamberton, in the collection district of Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, shall hereafter be known and denominated as the port of Trenton, in said district.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to in any way affect the validity of any act heretofore done by the collector or any official of said port, nor to in any way affect the official standing of any official of said port, or the powers and duties of any such official, the sole intent and purpose of this act being to change the name of said port.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1886.

Mr. O'FERRALL. If there be no objection I shall move to put the bill upon its passage.

At the time of the establishment of the port Lamberton was a small borough, with a separate incorporation, and situated near the head of tide-water navigation on the Delaware River. Trenton, with another and distinct corporate existence, was situated a short distance above Lamberton, on the same side of the river. In the course of time the two towns grew together, and Trenton being the larger and the capital of the State, its corporate limits were extended by an act of the legislature so as to embrace the borough of Lamberton. This was done many years ago, and since then Lamberton has really had no existence in name or in fact, being merged into Trenton.

The bill is properly guarded. The Secretary of the Treasury has replied to a communication addressed to him that "he sees no objection to its passage."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF ENTRY, MOUNT DESERT FERRY, MAINE.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 1026) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine. There has been a Senate bill passed and reported to this House, which bill has been acted on and reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce, which is the same in form as this. I ask that that be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to call up the Senate bill if he desires.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then I ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to substitute it. The gentleman has the same right to call up the Senate bill as the House bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then I call up for present consideration Senate bill No. 1013, providing for the same object as the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the House bill No. 1026 will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the port of Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine, be, and the same is hereby, established as a port of entry, subject to the same regulations, privileges, and facilities as other ports of entry in the United States: Provided, That the official duties of said port shall be performed under the direction of the collector of customs for the district of Frenchman's Bay, and by a deputy detailed by him for that purpose.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, like the former bill, there is no expense involved in this one. A similar bill was favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce of the last House. It has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce of this House, and is now before us for action. The House and Senate bills are identical in form; and therefore, unless there be some objection or some further information desired, I shall ask the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. COWLES. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman demands the previous question.

Mr. COWLES. I understood the managers of the bill were willing to accept this amendment.

The SPEAKER. But if the gentleman insists upon the previous question the Chair must put it to the House, and, if ordered, of course all amendments are cut off.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I have no objection to the amendment myself, although I deem it unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the previous question withdrawn?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I withdraw it. I repeat, I think the amendment entirely unnecessary, and the objection to it is that it will require the bill to go back to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not cause any additional expense to the Government of the United States or require any appropriation therefor."

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this bill already provides that there shall be no additional expense incurred by the establishment of this port of entry, and therefore the amendment is entirely unnecessary. I hope, therefore, it will be voted down.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I have but this to say in advocacy of the amendment: The bill provides that the duties of this new port of entry which is proposed to be established shall be discharged by the collector of customs for a district which is specified in the bill, and which will in all probability render necessary the appointment of an additional deputy collector. I do not see how they can discharge the duties of this new port of entry without additional expense for the necessary officers. If the amendment can do no harm I do not see why the gentleman should object to it. It is true that it may necessitate the sending of the bill back to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment, but that will take but a very short time, and there is no special hurry, I take it, for passing the bill in its present form.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already passed the Senate in the shape in which it now comes here for our action, and it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce of this House. There is no need for such an amendment, and I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection to the amendment of the bill if it did not necessitate its going back to the Senate. The bill as it stands now covers all the grounds that the amendment covers. There is no chance for any extra expense to be involved by reason of the passage of this bill. A deputy collector is now detailed to act at the port of Mount Desert Ferry, and all he has to do is to enter the goods there that would have to be carried 15 miles after they are transferred from the steam or sailing vessels and be entered at the port of Ellsworth; and the work done at the Mount Desert Ferry, Maine, is done now, and will be only that much less to be done at Ellsworth.

Now, I happen to know that in my own collection district, the district in which I live, as long ago as 1848 a port of entry was created at Camden, just as this is proposed to be created, because it is an advantage to commerce; and from that date to this it has occasioned not a dollar of extra expense to the Government. If the gentleman understood it as well as I do he would know this to be the case.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I demand the previous question upon the amendment and upon ordering the bill to be read the third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. COWLES, it was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 10, noes 57.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and having been read the third time, was passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 1397) to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill had better be reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts, be, and the same is hereby, constituted a port of delivery; and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said port; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs for said port, to reside at said port, who shall receive a salary to be determined in amount by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that bill should be considered in the regular way.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object to the bill being considered in the House if it is understood that it shall be open to amendment and debate.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I understand the gentleman from Indiana withdraws his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that the matter shall be open for reasonable consideration.

Mr. BEACH. I shall object unless we have a reasonable amount of time for the discussion of this proposition. I should like to have about five minutes myself.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. BEACH. I do not, with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union is discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I suppose the best way to put the House in possession of the facts in relation to this bill is to call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. O'FERRALL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1153) to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, Mass., beg leave to report:

That the population of Springfield is about 40,000; that the population within a radius of 20 miles, 100,000; and of 40 miles, 150,000 inhabitants; that it is the railroad center of Western Massachusetts—one hundred and ten trains arriving and departing daily, sixty-two of which are mail trains; that it is the financial, commercial, and banking center of Western Massachusetts, and stands third in the list of cities in the State in banking capital; that the imports in this section for the last year were nearly $3,000,000, and are rapidly increasing.

That the post-office at Springfield is the depositing office for two hundred and sixteen fourth-class offices, and is the recognized distributing mail center of Western Massachusetts.

The committee think that these facts are such as to raise Springfield to a point of so much importance as to justify the great desire upon the part of her citizens expressed to have it created a port of delivery.

In addition, the committee find that the importers at this point and vicinity labor under the disadvantages of having to go to New York or Boston to attend to clearing of goods, and the deliveries of goods are frequently delayed from fourteen to twenty days. The committee believe that the creation of said port of delivery would materially increase the importing business, promote the general prosperity of Springfield and other points of which it is the business center, and add to, rather than take from, the revenues of the Government.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That is the report of the Committee on Commerce of this House, and is a unanimous report. This bill has passed the Senate and is now before the House. Unless there is some opposition to it, I do not propose to detain the House with any explanation of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Virginia will explain the extent of the importations into Springfield during the past year. That information will furnish a test of the necessity for this bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. I will state that after the hearings before the committees of the House and the Senate on this matter, and before unanimous reports were made by both committees, this question was referred to the Treasury Department, and the Treasury Department sent a letter to the chairman of the House committee saying they saw no objection to the establishment of this port.

There was a hearing before the Treasury Department, and the facts that are now called for were then called for as to the amount of importations and the amount of duties paid at the city of Springfield. The statement presented, which was a detailed statement, showed that during the last year the approximate amount of duties was $386,615.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the letter of the Department be read.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I have here a copy of it, the original being with the committee. The amount of importations as testified before the committee was between two and three millions of dollars, I think close upon three millions. I send to the desk to be read the letter of the Assistant Secretary.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1886.

SIR: Referring to the letter from your committee of the 5th instant, and to Department's reply of the 18th instant, in relation to certain bills now under consideration in House Committee on Commerce, I have the honor to inform you that I see no objection to the passage of the bill constituting Springfield, Mass., a port of delivery, and extending thereto the privileges conferred by the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. What number of officers will be required at this new port?

Mr. ROCKWELL. It is supposed one officer can do the business.

Mr. RANDALL. Does this decrease the number at Boston?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I do not think it affects either Boston or New York, but I do not know as to that. Whatever is done at this point will not of course be done at the other points. This bill is based on the ground of the public convenience.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH].

Mr. BEACH. I have heard this argument before on the floor of this House, that because the Secretary of the Treasury sees no objection to a bill therefore that is a reason why the bill should pass. I have also heard on this floor the argument that because the Senate has passed a bill therefore that is a good reason why a bill should pass. But I remember a few days ago during my momentary absence from the Hall a bill somewhat similar to the one now under consideration was taken up and passed—a bill to extend to Omaha the benefits of the immediate transportation act, as it is sometimes called.

I was interested enough to go to the library and examine the statute, and I found that the port of Omaha was already entitled to the benefit of that act, and that there was no reason whatever for the passage of the act which went through this House, and which went through the Senate, and which had received the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury. But when that bill gets to the executive chamber I am under the impression it will not receive the approval of the Chief Executive.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BEACH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman know the importations of this place?

Mr. BEACH. I have no doubt that the commerce of Springfield is very large.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not speak of the commerce; I speak of the importations.

Mr. LONG. I will answer the gentleman. It is some two or three million dollars. The duties amount to two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BEACH. I have heard the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL] and also the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], that the establishment of Springfield as a port of delivery would tend to increase commerce. I think it would tend to increase the office-holders and the expenses of the General Government.

Now I am of the belief that we should stop establishing these ports of delivery and ports of entry, and in this connection I desire to call attention to what a very respectable and able gentleman, who filled the position of Secretary of the Treasury during the last administration, has said upon this question. Judge Folger, in his report of 1883, said:

There are twenty-two ports of entry at which not a dollar of duty has been collected for years at different times. There are twenty-two ports of entry in which the year's collections from all sources have not equaled the year's expenses. The custom-houses in those districts are, however, kept up with all the formalities of activity, with deputies, inspectors, and clerks to make official returns to the accounting officers of the Treasury and the Bureau of Statistics.

In the same line the present Secretary of the Treasury, under date of January 13, 1886, says:

In twenty-three of these districts there were no collections of duties on imports or tonnage. At such places the office of collector or surveyor is practically a sinecure; the official work consisting chiefly in the preparation of the numerous returns required by law and regulations to be rendered to the accounting officers.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will not consume time in discussing a matter not before the House. Our time is limited for this business, and there are several bills that ought to be considered.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a moment more. I desire to say in conclusion that, as I understand it, the Secretary of the Treasury will not give to any port of delivery the benefit of the act for the immediate transportation of dutiable goods unless at that port there are proper officers to appraise the goods. Therefore, if this bill passes, it amounts to a requirement that there must be not only a collector, but a surveyor and appraiser, and for that reason I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Department I understand has been not to permit this immediate-transportation privilege, except on goods where the duties are specific and where, therefore, no appraisement is required. As to the twenty-two places to which allusion has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH], the trouble is that the pay of the officers there comes out of the Treasury without the action of Congress, under the law which permits five and a half millions to be distributed out of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received. If Congress could pass annually upon the force required for the collection of the customs revenue, then such evils as those complained of would cease. Otherwise there ought to be, in my judgment, a recommendation from the Department that those places be abolished.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to get light upon this subject; but I submit that it is occupying time which should be devoted to other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. What I have said is directly in the line of this bill. However, I do not desire to occupy time.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH]. He has replied to himself, as he usually does upon this floor. So far as the views of a former Secretary of the Treasury are concerned I prefer to take the advice of the present Secretary of the Treasury, and he favors the establishment of this port of delivery. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered. The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN was recognized, and yielded the floor to Mr. TARSNEY.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 264) granting to the Ohio Central Railroad Company the right to lay its track through the United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company is hereby authorized to maintain and use its track through the United States property at lock and dam No. 6, on the north side of the Great Kanawha River, in Kanawha County, West Virginia, and to use for a right of way through said property a section of land 54 feet wide and bounded and described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point in the lower line of the United States lot 163 feet from the cornerstone marking the lower or western end of the line to said lot along the public road, running thence south 66 degrees west 600 feet through the said lot to a point in the upper line thereof; thence with said upper line south 24 degrees 30 minutes east, crossing the center line of the said railroad at 27 feet, in all 54 feet; thence north 66 degrees east 600 feet through the said lot to a point in the lower line thereof; thence with the lower line of said lot north 24 degrees 30 minutes west, crossing the center line of the said railroad at 27 feet, in all 54 feet, to the place of beginning, containing about three-fourths of an acre. And the privilege is also hereby granted to said company of hereafter laying, maintaining, and using a track through the United States property on the north bank of said river at lock and dam No. 4, and at lock and dam No. 3, and at lock and dam No. 2, in said county, subject, however, to the antecedent written consent and approval of the Secretary of War as to location, construction, and width of right of way: Provided, however, That the said company shall construct and maintain, at its own cost, all such wagon-crossings, cattle-guards, and fences over and along the line of its road through the said Government property, at all of the four lock and dam sites mentioned in this bill, as may be required by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the said company shall take up and remove its track or tracks from the said property, or any part thereof, at either or all of the four sites mentioned, whenever thereto directed by the Secretary of War; and such removal shall not be made the foundation for any claim for damages against the United States: And provided further, That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia."

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 12, strike out "south" and insert "north."
In line 13, strike out "west" and insert "east."
In line 17, strike out "north" and insert "south."
In line 18, strike out "east" and insert "west."

Mr. COWLES. I make the point of order that this bill should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. As I understand, it appropriates public property.

Mr. TARSNEY. It does not appropriate public property, nor any money.

Mr. COWLES. As I understand, the effect of the bill is to take public property for the road-bed, &c., of this railroad company. I make the point under subdivision 3 of Rule XXIII.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TARSNEY. The United States Government owns some locks and dams on the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia. The Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company desires merely to lay its track across this lock and dam property. It does not ask any cession of property rights from the United States Government. This matter has been referred to the Secretary of War, who reports that there is no objection from his Department to the passage of the bill. The measure does not propose to grant away any rights of the Government.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand the provision which undertakes to protect the Government from liability for damages. I hope that portion of the bill will be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the said company shall take up and remove its track or tracks from the said property, or any part thereof, at either or all of the four sites mentioned, whenever thereto directed by the Secretary of War; and such removal shall not be made the foundation for any claim for damages against the United States: And provided further, That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

Mr. TARSNEY. In other words, whenever the Secretary of War may direct the removal of the tracks, the company will be required to remove them without any claim against the United States for compensation.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TARSNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

Mr. TARSNEY. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots," approved April 17, 1874.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots," approved April 17, 1874, be hereby so amended as to read as follows:

"That any alien who, in the manner provided by law, has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and who shall have been a permanent resident of the United States for at least six months immediately prior to the granting of such license, may be licensed, as if already naturalized, to serve as an engineer or pilot upon any steam-vessel subject to inspection under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,' approved February 28, 1871: Provided, however, That to entitle an alien who has procured a license under the provisions of this act to a renewal of such license he shall be required to furnish to the inspectors, with the application for a renewal of such license, satisfactory evidence, under oath, of the continuous residence of such applicant within the United States for a period of one year immediately prior to the date of such application: And provided further, That no license shall be granted to a person who has been a resident of the United States for a period of four years, or who shall have received a fourth renewal license, unless such applicant for such license shall exhibit to such inspectors, with his application for a license, a certificate of his admission as a citizen of the United States."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 26, strike out "four years" and insert "five years."

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, a brief statement of the purpose of this bill is all that is necessary. We have upon vessels belonging to citizens of the United States something over sixteen thousand officers. Upon the great Western lakes it has been our experience that people living outside of our territory come into it, procure licenses as officers of steam-vessels, and take our money back to their country and spend it. The purpose of this bill is not to prohibit such persons coming within our boundaries, but to require them to conform to our regulations and to pay to this Government some allegiance if they seek employment in our vessels. That is all there is in the bill. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TARSNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WATER-POWER IMPROVEMENT, LITTLE FALLS, MINN.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM].

Mr. BYNUM. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 463) to authorize the improvement of the water-power of the Mississippi River at Little Falls, Minn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Little Falls Water-Power Company of Minnesota to improve and develop the water-power in the Mississippi River at Little Falls, in the State of Minnesota, by constructing, maintaining, and operating in said river, at said Little Falls, dams, piers, sluice-ways, canals, locks, ponds, breakwaters, abutments, and mill-sites for manufacturing purposes: Provided, That there shall be placed and maintained in connection with said dam and other works a sluice-way, lock, or other fixture sufficient and so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam or other works without unreasonable delay or hinderance: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may at any time require such changes and alterations to be made in said works, at the expense of said water-power company, as he may deem advisable and necessary in the interest of navigation.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "hindrance," in line 14, "and without tolls or charges."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYNUM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. BYNUM. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my colleague [Mr. BYNUM] will explain the purpose of this bill.

Mr. BYNUM. The purpose of the bill is simply to allow the construction of dams, sluice-ways, locks, &c., at Little Falls. There is no navigation of the Mississippi River at that point, and the Secretary of War reports that if there ever should be navigation there this improvement would be an aid to navigation. This bill proposes to allow these parties to improve the water-power at that point by the construction of dams, locks, &c., but without the right to impose any tolls or other charges, and subject to the power of the Secretary of War to order the removal of the works at the expense of the water-power company should any obstruction to the navigation arise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the river and harbor bill now pending contains a very considerable appropriation for extending the surveys even above this point. Of course I have no objection to the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BYNUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASTORIA AND WINNEMUCCA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BYNUM. I now call up Senate bill 901, to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not upon the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BYNUM. It was reported yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be sent for.

Mr. BYNUM. While we are waiting for that bill I will yield the floor to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to call up a bill, which may be passed in the mean time.

NATIONAL LIVE-STOCK HIGHWAY.

Mr. REAGAN. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 721) to establish a national live-stock highway, and to promote commerce in live stock between the States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the public lands in range numbered 41, along the east line of the State of Colorado, it being a fractional range, averaging about 2 miles in width, be, and is hereby, reserved from sale, settlement, pre-emption, or location for any purpose whatever, under any law of the United States, for the period of ten years, and is hereby set apart as a national live-stock highway for such period.

SEC. 2. That for the period aforesaid said highway may be used for the purpose of a national highway for live stock passing from one State or Territory to another or to market.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill passed the Senate without objection, and has been unreported by the Committee on Commerce in this House. Its only object is to establish a national live-stock highway, and thereby promote commerce in live stock between the States. If there be no objection I will move the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I do not see the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] in the House, and, as this measure affects his territory, I would like to know what his wishes in the matter are. Is he for it or against it?

Mr. REAGAN. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that not only is the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] in favor of the bill, but it was supported in the Senate by both the Senators from that State.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether there is anything to show that any portion of the territory which is proposed to be appropriated by this bill for the purpose of establishing a national live-stock highway is now occupied by actual settlers?

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask my colleague to answer the gentleman's question in that regard.

Mr. MILLER. If gentlemen of the House will get the report of the Senate Committee they will find that the Secretary of the Interior states not only is the territory embraced in this national live-stock highway not occupied by actual settlers, but that on account of the character of the land it is not capable of being settled. I know from the very best sources of information that there are no settlers upon this land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and bringing it before the House for present action?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I hope we will have some description of exactly where this road is to run.

Mr. REAGAN. It is to pass over the Pan Handle and up the east border of Colorado. It does not touch Kansas at all.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I understand the gentleman to say it does not touch Kansas?

Mr. REAGAN. No, it does not.

Mr. LYMAN. Is it in order to have the bill read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to have the bill read before this request is disposed of.

Mr. PERKINS. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object to the bill being brought before the House to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection that order is made.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill is very much desired. The drive of young cattle from Texas to the Northwest for the purpose of pasturing them has become a business of large proportions. It appears from the report there are some three hundred thousand cattle annually driven to the Northwest for that purpose. The bill to establish a national live-stock highway, which has been drawn in the interest of the commerce in live stock between the States, is acceptable to the Senators of Colorado and to all the parties who are interested in this business. The drive is just now beginning, and a refusal on the part of this House to take up and pass the Senate bill will injure the men engaged in this business hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars. It is because of this great industry, which does much to aid in supplying the meat markets of the world, and because it gives these stock-raisers some chance to pasture their stock, I trust the bill will be taken up and disposed of at once.

Mr. SPRINGER. How wide is this national live-stock highway to be?

Mr. REAGAN. Two miles wide.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is to be its length?

Mr. REAGAN. The whole of the eastern border of Colorado. As stated by my colleague, and perhaps in the confusion it was not heard, the Secretary of the Interior has stated there was no part of the land covered by this proposed highway which is occupied by actual settlers, and that it was not only not settled, but on account of the character of the land was incapable of settlement. This highway, therefore, while it would be of great service to these stock-raisers, would really interfere with nobody. It merely aims to secure the right of driving cattle for a limited period over this country which is not capable of settlement.

Mr. MCADOO. What is the aggregate number of acres to be taken up by this bill?

Mr. REAGAN. This is 2 miles wide I think in its widest part, and from that down to less than a mile. I do not exactly remember, but it does not exceed that in its widest part.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand the gentleman from Texas correctly, this land does not admit of cultivation; in other words, it is not agricultural land?

Mr. REAGAN. It was so reported to the Secretary. It was so stated by the officers of whom inquiry was made by the Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand, it lies west of the Indian Territory——

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir; it does not go through the State of Kansas, but passes through what is called the Pan Handle of Texas.

Mr. STEELE. Suppose there are settlers now upon the land, what will be their status in the event of the passage of this bill?

Mr. REAGAN. We are informed that there are none upon the land; but this should not affect them even if there were any.

Mr. STEELE. But if there are any, what will be the effect?

Mr. LANHAM. The passage of this bill could not interfere with any vested rights even if there should be any settlers upon that strip.

Mr. STEELE. Is that clearly set out in the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. Well, if you will make an amendment saving the rights of settlers, as far as I am concerned there will be no objection to it, although I think the bill is sufficiently explicit.

Mr. HOLMAN. The principal objection to the passage of this bill would seem to be its apparent favoritism in the interest of large operations. I am opposed to favoritism being shown to any interest, whether great or small, but I think of the two it is better indeed to favor a condition of affairs which rather benefits small operations than great ones. The tendency of legislation is ordinarily to favor great interests and at the public expense; and this is my principal objection to this measure. If the land in this case is not required for settlement by the people, of course no obstacle, it would seem, should be thrown in the way of making the provision which this bill contemplates; but if the land admits of agriculture or improvement, and that is an important point, you withdraw necessarily by this grant a large body of land from settlement.

Mr. REAGAN. My friend from Indiana will understand, for he knows the character of this region of country, that it is not agricultural land.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a very dry and arid region, I admit, but it seems as if it was susceptible of improvement.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It is subject to irrigation now.

Mr. REAGAN. The passage of this bill is very important, because there are large interests involved; and a failure to pass the bill will work almost irreparable injury to a large number of people who are interested in this cattle business in various ways.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas how these people have done heretofore in this respect?

Mr. REAGAN. They have met with various difficulties.

I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the whole trouble comes from the fact, as alleged and believed, that certain conditions which prevail along the coast up to a certain degree of latitude produce a disease among the cattle which is of a contagious character. In order to avoid bringing cattle through this region of country to which reference is made, so as to avoid contact with diseased cattle, is the principal purpose of the measure now before us. At a certain point of latitude north of the Gulf coast it is said that there is no danger of this disease being produced; and hence contact with diseased cattle is avoided by opening this trail. It is manifestly in the interest of all consumers as well as shippers to protect cattle from disease.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How are the cattle now driven?

Mr. REAGAN. They are driven by various routes, but they are very liable to contagion.

If there be no further objections I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I am willing to withdraw the demand to allow the gentleman that privilege.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am compelled to ask the chairman of the committee to give me time to call up a measure under the agreement.

Mr. REAGAN. I will attend to that.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this trail shall not be used until the present bona fide settlers on said trail shall have been bought out or their consent obtained.

Mr. REAGAN. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that there should also be the right to alter or repeal the act reserved in case of emergencies.

Mr. REAGAN. That is not necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is, because this is in the nature of a contract, which will be valid——

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; let the words be inserted, "and the right of the Government to repeal the law is reserved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 29.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum.

Mr. LANHAM. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall be forced, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw the bill under the understanding I have with other gentlemen, and yield to my colleague——

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Is there objection to the withdrawal of the bill?

There was no objection, and the bill was withdrawn.

YELLOW FEVER INVESTIGATION.

Mr. DAVIS. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5542) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the truth of alleged discoveries of the specific cause of yellow fever and of a method of preventing that disease by inoculation, and to obtain all information possible as to the cause and prevention of that disease; and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk commenced to read the bill. Before he had finished the reading,

The SPEAKER said: The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

The bill in full is as follows:

Whereas protection against yellow fever is of the highest national importance, affecting our commerce, foreign and domestic, the health of our seaports, efficiency and safety of the Army and Navy (perchance necessarily operating in an infected region), the lives of the sailors of our merchant marine, and also virtually involving the social, industrial, and commercial growth of Tennessee and the Southern Atlantic and Gulf States of the Union, including such prosperous and populous cities as Memphis, Charleston, Savannah, Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston; and

Whereas there is a large and accumulating mass of testimony that the power of protecting against yellow fever has been discovered in the inoculation of the essential germ or cause of the disease, by methods distinctly formulated and made available, there being cited in support of the discovery declarations and numerous instances of the successful application of the methods, emanating from Drs. Freire and Carmona, medical scientists at the head of the biological departments in the highest institutions of learning in Brazil and Mexico, authorized by and under the patronage of their respective governments; and

Whereas it is a manifest public duty that under the sanction and authority of the United States the said discoveries should be thoroughly investigated, tested, and, if found to be efficacious, made available for the protection of our people: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission, which shall proceed to Mexico, and, if necessary, to the Central American states, Havana, and Brazil, and there make a careful and complete investigation of and report, after thorough examination, the methods of inoculation pursued and their effectiveness in protecting against yellow fever, together with all other information relative to that disease which may be discovered by experiment or otherwise.

SEC. 2. That the said commission shall consist of three persons, two of whom shall be officers of the Government, medical men of known ability and special attainment in biological research, particularly in the department of microscopic investigation and methods of culture of the essential germs causative of the infectious and contagious diseases. The other member of the commission shall be a medical man not an officer of the Government, of recognized ability, based upon long and ample experience in observation and treatment of yellow fever, competent to give expert consideration to all phases of the symptoms and course of that disease in any form wherein the phenomena of the disease may present themselves, whether induced in the course of pestilential invasion or in purposely devised inoculation.

SEC. 3. That the commission be authorized to employ such skilled assistants as it may deem necessary, and to fix the rate of their compensation: Provided, That the entire expenses of the commission shall be limited to the amount of the appropriation herein named.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall make, within twelve months of its appointment, a detailed report of its labors to the President of the United States, to be submitted by him to Congress. But if necessary for the accomplishment of its work, it may continue its labors two years, making also a final report: Provided, That that portion of the report covering the expenses of the commission shall be made under oath.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be actually required to pay the necessary traveling and other expenses, and the salary of the member of the commission who shall be appointed from civil life, and its employés, be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $5,000 per annum shall be paid as a recompense to the member of the aforesaid commission not already in the service of the Government.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Illinois," in line 920, the following:
"And the further sum of $25,000 shall be expended between the Grand Rapids and the city of Terre Haute, Ind."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read. When the committee rose last evening it was dividing upon it, and the point of no quorum was made. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I should like to be allowed five minutes in further explanation of my amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. The matter has been discussed, and I hope my friend will not press his request.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object?

Mr. WILLIS. I do. A further argument from the gentleman from Indiana would necessitate reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest that there is now a quorum present, and we might settle the question more quickly by a rising vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I only ask unanimous consent for five minutes to give an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. And to that request objection has been made.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 94.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I withdraw the point as to a quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving White River, Indiana: Continuing improvement below Hazelton, $7,500.

Mr. GUENTHER. I move to strike out the last word. From the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors down to the unselfish patriot who hails from a dry district without river, harbor, or canal, and therefore vehemently opposes, under some pretext or another, the different items of this bill, and hopes for its ultimate defeat, everybody seems to agree to the proposition that something should be done to cheapen the cost of transportation, and that this question is the problem of the hour.

Finding this sentiment so unanimous, I had hoped that the contingent appropriation proposed by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], looking to the improvement of the Wisconsin River with a view of completing a cheap through route of water transportation between the Mississippi and the great lakes, would receive favorable action.

From the first survey, in 1817 by Major Long to the last, all competent engineers have agreed that the through route of transportation between the Mississippi and Lake Michigan via the Wisconsin and Fox Rivers is an excellent one and that the plans of improvement are entirely practicable. The Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement can be completed for less than half of the sum that would be required to get the Hennepin Canal fairly started. It is a natural route, not requiring the construction of a new canal, as the one connecting the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers has been completed. It is 7 miles long at a depth of 4 feet of water at low water. For the last four years no money has been expended upon the Wisconsin River; that accounts for it that no progress has been made on that river. What little has been done theretofore has demonstrated that the river can be so improved as to afford practical navigation.

The Fox and Wisconsin route is a shorter and a more feasible one than any other route that has been proposed. From Saint Paul it has about 250 miles of Mississippi River navigation, 112 miles on the Wisconsin, 7 miles of canal, and 146 miles on the Fox River. It is now estimated that three millions more are required to complete this route, so that 5 feet of water, at low water, will be secured along the whole route. In my opinion, and I speak from conviction, this improvement would be of incalculable value to the whole Northwest. Gentlemen can figure out for themselves how much cheaper this route will be than the Hennepin Canal.

The last census shows that the center of the wheat and corn districts lies west of the Mississippi River and opposite the mouth of the Wisconsin River.

The advocates of the Hennepin Canal can say nothing which may not be said with as much truth of the Fox and Wisconsin route. Besides, it will cost about one-seventh of what the Hennepin Canal or any other route will cost. It is therefore in the interest of wise and economical government to complete this work. If after it is done there should be a necessity for the Hennepin Canal, we can then construct it; but certainly we should first carry out that work which gives at least equal advantages and involves a much smaller expenditure and will give a short and efficient through route of practical navigation between the Mississippi and the great lakes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRUMM took the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. GUENTHER. I thank my friend from Pennsylvania, but I will not occupy the time of the committee further. All I will say is that I hope the action of the committee on the amendment offered by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] will be reconsidered, and that that amendment will prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I only desire to say a few words, for I have no disposition to get into any controversy with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] in regard to routes connecting the lakes with the Upper Mississippi River; but I want to say so far as the Wisconsin River is concerned the Engineer Department, or the Chief of Engineers upon his own motion, organized a board of engineers to examine that route, and no appropriation has been made for it purely and simply on account of the unfavorable report made by that board of engineers.

Mr. GUENTHER. Will the gentleman allow me to state that the amendment offered by my colleague was to provide a contingent appropriation, contingent on the report to be made by the engineers?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I will say as to that that the report which has already been made is of such a character that the House can not afford to make any appropriation until after the board of engineers appointed for that purpose have examined this river and made their report and determined what can be done and what it will cost.

Mr. GUENTHER. That is what my colleague bases his amendment on.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. But you propose to appropriate one hundred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be expended if the engineers shall make a favorable report.

Mr. GUENTHER. That is it exactly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. But they may make a favorable report that the river can be improved, but it may cost five or ten or twenty millions; and I say it is due to the House to know what the probable expense will be before we commit the House in any way to the proposition.

Mr. GUENTHER. It will be about three millions.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois I think misunderstood my amendment. It proposes to expend $100,000 on the Wisconsin River provided the engineers make a favorable report; and only 33⅓ per cent. of what they may estimate shall be for expenditure this year, which can not be over two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WILLIS. Suppose they make it one hundred millions?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. If the supposition is that the Engineer Corps would do an impossible thing the question has some pertinency, otherwise it has not. The committee seem to have implicit confidence in the Department of Engineers, but they will not agree to the adoption of this amendment in this bill.

Here in this bill are insignificant creeks like the Mosquito and other creeks that have had appropriations, and we know the majority of the streams for which $15,000,000 are appropriated in this bill are insignificant.

But I think, sir, the people will regard this $15,000,000 as in a great measure thrown away upon these creeks and "rivers" that are of no commercial importance, while at the same time the great rivers and the great harbors of the country are neglected. And this plan of appropriating 33⅓ per cent. of the amount required is virtually a waste of the public money, because when a flood comes these small streams are swollen, and the incomplete works are washed away and destroyed. I submit that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have proceeded upon a wrong plan. They ought to have provided first for completing the improvements on the important rivers and harbors of the country instead of squandering the money in this way, and at the proper time I shall move that this bill be recommitted, with instructions to report a bill appropriating the $10,000,000 which the Engineer Corps, as I understand, say is all that can be profitably expended this year upon the real rivers and harbors of the country which are of commercial importance. I shall make that motion in order that these little creeks and streams and bayous, upon which hundreds of thousands of dollars are squandered by this bill, may be cut out, and that the money expended for the improvement of our water ways may result in some benefit to the people and to the navigation of the great rivers of the country. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows.

Improving Calumet River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $35,000; of which $10,000 are to be used in dredging the river between the forks and a point half a mile east of Hammond: Provided, however, That no part of said sum shall be expended, nor any sum heretofore appropriated, until the entire right of way, as set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 9, second session Forty-seventh Congress, shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and the United States shall be fully released from all liability for damages to adjacent property-owners, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors recommends the following amendments: In line 927 strike out the words "shall be expended;" in line 928, after the word "appropriated," insert "except the said $10,000 for the river above the forks shall be expended." In line 935, after the word "war," insert:

And if any of the owners of real estate required to be taken or that is damaged for the purpose of straightening or widening that portion of the Calumet River for which the appropriation herein is now made, can not be induced to convey to the United States such real estate so required, and release their claim for damages caused by said improvement, or should the owner or owners be incapable of conveying and releasing, or should his or her name or residence be unknown, or he or she be a non-resident of the State of Illinois, it shall then be the duty of the United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois to immediately file a petition in any court having jurisdiction thereof, in the manner and as authorized by the laws of the State of Illinois in such cases, for the purpose of ascertaining the just compensation to be paid to the respective owners of the land taken or damaged: Provided, however, That the other owners of property and parties interested in said improvement shall first contribute the costs of such proceeding, and shall furnish the amount necessary to pay any judgment that may be rendered; and on failure to do so the cause shall be dismissed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments proposed by the committee. The first two being being merely formal amendments, if there is no objection they will be considered together.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object to voting upon the amendments together. Let us take them one by one. I would like an explanation of this provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the third amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like some explanation of this provision.

Mr. WILLIS. Upon what point does the gentleman desire explanation?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like an explanation of this item of the bill. As I understand, you propose to condemn private property.

Mr. WILLIS. The object is simply to give the right of way. The owners of property themselves are to pay for it. The improvement is in the Calumet River, near Chicago, and this provision simply enables the owners of the property to secure a wider channel.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas inquires why this proposition is placed in the bill. It is there because the engineers recommend that "no sum shall be expended on the river until the right of way shall have been conveyed to the United States free from expense, and the United States shall be fully released from all liability for damages to adjacent property-owners to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War."

The river and harbor bill of 1884 provided an appropriation of $50,000 for the Calumet River based on this condition. It has been impossible to obtain the necessary consent from all the owners of adjacent property. Some of these owners can not readily be found, some others seem unwilling to make the required concessions, and to enable this improvement to be carried out it has been deemed proper by many in interest to insert this clause to allow condemnation proceedings.

The proposition simply provides that the other owners of property shall contribute the costs of such proceedings and furnish money to pay any judgment that may be rendered, and failing to do so the proceedings for condemnation shall be dismissed.

There is no possible chance under the terms of this paragraph for the Government to be "out" any money whatever, except what is to be expended in widening and deepening the river, as provided by the appropriation.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why is this provision in regard to straightening the river inserted?

Mr. DUNHAM. Because the river is extremely crooked at places where it is necessary to straighten it. It comes under the same head as a recommendation of the engineers.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It also comes under the biblical provision that the crooked places shall be made straight. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend who represents the Cook County district [Mr. DUNHAM] if it is not true that however much merit other provisions in this bill may have, this provision touches the commerce of South Chicago and Chicago, and is unquestionably meritorious?

Mr. DUNHAM. It is.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Gasconade River, Missouri: Continuing improvement, $7,500.

Mr. MCADOO. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to waste the time of the Committee of the Whole, but I want to compliment the able, urbane, and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. WILLIS] for the superb tact which he has displayed in conducting this bill through the House.

This Gasconade River is an old friend of mine. I called attention to it in the Forty-eighth Congress; and if gentlemen will turn to the report made by the engineers to that Congress they will find it stated there that most of the work upon this turbulent, riotous, and romantic stream had been done in the office. That was the exact language in the report to the Forty-eighth Congress; and upon that we were asked in that Congress to appropriate some three or four thousand dollars, if I remember aright without having the report before me, to continue the work in the office. I suppose they took it in the office for fear it might run away or dry up.

Now I make this amendment simply for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House the great mistakes of this river and harbor bill. Here is a stream which, according to the present report—and I must compliment the engineers upon the improvement in their report—is simply a small, obscure creek, overshadowed by trees, filled with logs, and crammed from the mouth to the headwaters with snags. The engineers first stated, according to their own showing in this report, that it would take $50,000 to improve this stream. They now admit that although $30,000 has already been appropriated and expended, it will after the expenditure of the $50,000 require from Congress an annual appropriation to keep anything like water in that stream; to keep the logs, snags, bowlders, rocks, and wrecks damp. Why, Mr. Chairman—and I submit this question to my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], who leads this committee—would it not be a wiser thing to macadamize this stream and make a good country road of it? [Laughter.]

Where is the Gasconade River? Where does this romantic stream "gasconade?" What interstate commerce is profited by this annual dribbling of the people's money in sums of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, and $7,500 into this gasconading, boastful river off in the State of Missouri? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is appropriations like this—ill-advised appropriations to get local support in this House—which have caused all the caricature and abuse to which this bill has been subjected in the press of the country. We have no guarantee from the report of the engineers that if we give them $7,500 for this stream this year we shall not have to give them $10,000 next year. It depends entirely upon the action of nature in the coming spring. If we have a good deal of rain and the logs come down and the snags gather, the voice of Gasconade will be heard in the Fiftieth Congress asking for $10,000 to remove the additional snags and logs that may have been brought down the stream by the force of nature. The only way to improve this stream would be for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to find some scientific man who will prevent the snags from gathering, and the logs from floating, and the trees from growing along the Gasconade.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that a wise thing for Congress to do in order that this great national beneficial scheme of improving internal commerce shall go on is to put its foot down upon the Gasconades, the Caseys Creeks, the Buncombe Bays, and the Roaring Rivers that are continually cropping up in the river and harbor bill. Let us act like business men. Let us act like members who have sworn to support the Constitution; and while appropriating for legitimate projects of national importance, let us not dribble away the people's money, wrung from them by taxation, in these constant annual appropriations that are more than wasted—criminally wasted—in appropriations of such small sums that no benefit inures to the stream and no benefit inures to the people, the results of our expenditure being blotted away by nature every year, and leaving these streams as if nothing had been done, the only effect being to give business to the military and civil engineers and the contractors, who according to the report of a prior Congress had done nothing toward improving this noble gasconading and money-demanding stream except by working in the offices on it. Let us stick to facts, and deal squarely and honestly with these improvement schemes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry indeed that my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] has made this attack on the Gasconade River in the absence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] representing that district, who if he were here would, I know, reply in a very able speech and demonstrate the importance of this stream. I am very little inclined to undertake to supply the place of the gentleman from Missouri. This Gasconade River is not so large a river as the Mississippi; it is not so big as the Atlantic Ocean. But it has commerce; and those people living there, far removed from the Atlantic seaboard, where my friend from New Jersey had the privilege of being born, want to get to the Atlantic coast. We are trying to enable them to get to where he lives; and Congress for several years has been making these small appropriations to enable them to advance toward the civilization that surrounds the gentleman from New Jersey. I hope he will not protest against this appropriation. Those people want to meet him. They want to sell their produce to his people; and in the absence of the gentleman from Missouri I request him as a personal favor toward this Gasconade River and the people interested in it to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I have been pained to see the spirit evinced by some gentlemen on this floor for whom I have great personal regard. The gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. MCADOO, and the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. SPOONER, representing two States which, in proportion to their area, have received larger appropriations than any other State in the Union, are the first to commence their attacks upon this bill.

Mr. MCADOO. What is the amount appropriated for the State of New Jersey in this bill?

Mr. WHEELER. I can not state exactly the amount in this bill for the State of New Jersey, but I find by examining the laws passed by Congress previous to this time, that that State has received, in proportion to its area, five times as much as the other States and Territories in the Union. That is to say, New Jersey has received $1,451,500 for rivers and harbors wholly within her borders, and as her area is but 7,815 square miles, she has received at the rate of $186 per square mile. There has been expended for the whole country $144,237,539 for the same purpose, which would be but $39 per square mile. But in addition to this the Government has expended much more money for the benefit of New Jersey. The entire southern and western and, I might properly add, part of the northern boundaries of New Jersey lie upon the Delaware River and the Delaware Bay, and the Government has already expended upon the Delaware River $1,452,000, and this bill appropriates $250,000 more, aggregating $1,702,000, and was largely for the benefit of New Jersey. Beside this very large sums have been expended on the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey, which was also largely for the benefit of New Jersey. And when we add to these sums $2,617,103.70 expended by the Government upon the Delaware Breakwater, which was also largely for the benefit of New Jersey, I submit that my friend's State has no just grounds for complaint of the illiberality of the people of the United States.

Mr. MCADOO. This bill does not appropriate $100,000 for the State of New Jersey.

Mr. WHEELER. One hundred thousand dollars for a State of 7,815 square miles is more in proportion than is given to other States. But let us see. This bill gives for the harbor at Raritan Bay, New Jersey, $30,000; Maurice River, $5,000; Passaic River, $35,000; Raritan River, $35,000; Shrewsbury River, $10,000; South River, $5,000; in all, $120,000. In addition to which it appropriates $15,000 for the channel between New Jersey and Staten Island, $240,000 for the Delaware River—and the bill requires that all this amount shall be expended for the improvement of the river between Trenton, N. J., and the mouth of said river—showing that it is largely for the benefit of New Jersey. In addition to this the bill appropriates $75,000 for the Delaware Breakwater, also largely for the benefit of New Jersey.

Mr. MCADOO. But the gentleman forgets the population of that State.

Mr. WHEELER. We do not appropriate by people, but by territory. It costs just as much to improve a river with a small population on its banks as it would to improve the same river if its banks were thickly populated. It costs just as much to improve a harbor with small cities upon it as it would if large cities beautified its shores. It is the length of the river, the extent of the harbor, and the amount of work to be done that measures the cost.

The gentleman from New Jersey moves to strike out the small appropriation for Gasconade River, Missouri, and denounces the bill because it contains an appropriation for this river, which he says is not larger than a creek. He is quite mistaken regarding the size and importance of this river, but referring to the law making appropriations for rivers and harbors in 1882 I see it appropriated $15,000 for Cheesequake Creek, New Jersey, $6,000 for Mattawan Creek, New Jersey, $5,000 for Cohansey Creek, New Jersey, and $5,000 for Woodbridge Creek, New Jersey.

Mr. SOWDEN. Is the State of New Jersey in the Union? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, it is; and we are going to hold her there; we are going to take care of her and provide for her rivers and harbors. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] says that the press of the country is against this bill. What press is against it? The press of the great West does not oppose it. The press of the great South does not oppose it. It may be that a portion of the press of New York city opposes it—the papers printed within a stone's throw of Wall street, where are located the headquarters of all the great railroad combinations in the United States. This, Mr. Chairman, is the only press which antagonizes this bill.

THE OPPOSITION TO THIS BILL does not come from the people. In 1884 the capital stock and bonds of the railroads of the United States aggregated the enormous sum of $7,431,732,458, nearly one-half of which, or $3,000,000,000—a sum more than double our national debt—is admitted to be "watered," representing no property whatever, and it is the effort to secure large dividends upon this enormous amount of fictitious wealth that prompts and directs much of the opposition to this bill. And it is natural that this should be so. For by providing the country with cheap water transportation we cheapen railroad freights and threaten the privilege now enjoyed of levying a tax upon the labor and industry of the country to secure these dividends upon these unreal values.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], whose State has received from the Government for improvements wholly within her borders ten times as much as has been received by the State of Alabama, makes his first objection (at least the first objection which I have heard during the present session) to expenditures by the General Government by attacking this bill, which makes absolutely necessary appropriations to provide the necessary facilities for commerce and thereby cheapen the cost of transportation.

This bill appropriates an amount which will be equal to about 25 cents for every inhabitant of the United States, and the effect of this expenditure will be that millions of people will reap a direct and positive benefit by saving from $50 to $100 in the cost of transporting their wheat, corn, and other products to market. And every laboring man in the country will be enabled to purchase the articles which enter into the daily consumption of his family at a price so greatly reduced as to repay this meager outlay more than a hundred fold.

I can not agree with the gentleman from New York, who foresees danger to the liberties of our working people if they be employed by the Government upon these important works which are absolutely essential to the welfare of all the people.

I regret also to see that this bill is opposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. An investigation of the records shows that his State—although it has existed as such for less than forty years—has benefited by eleven important river improvements, the expense of which was wholly borne by the Government. One of these improvements alone (Des Moines Rapids) cost the United States more than $4,000,000.

Let me say to those gentlemen who have perverted this discussion into unfriendly criticism of the Democratic party that it is not necessary expenditures, judiciously and economically made for the benefit of the whole people of the United States—and particularly of the working people—that the Democratic party is pledged to oppose. It advocates all such measures. But it is the profligate administration of the Government; the stealing of millions of dollars appropriated for building up our dismantled Navy; the donation of boundless tracts of the public domain to huge corporations; the official corruption which disgraced twenty-five years of Republican supremacy—it is these which the Democratic party has opposed and stricken down; against the perpetuation of which it stands irrevocably committed, and which under the guidance of that party, upheld by the virtue and manhood of the American people, never can be repeated.

The gentleman from Rhode Island seems to think his State has not received the usual bountiful appropriations to which it has been accustomed. By examining the records of our Government I find that up to January, 1884, the amount received by Rhode Island from the General Government for the improvement of her rivers and harbors was more than three times as much in proportion to her area as that received by any other State in the Union, and more than in the same proportion as has been received by the State of Alabama; and in reading this bill I find that it appropriates to Rhode Island much more, in proportion to her area, than to any other State—at least fifteen times as much as is given to the State a part of which I represent.

TWENTY-FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] made an eloquent speech about the Constitution and an honest, economic government; but if he will read this bill carefully he will find, as I have shown, that it appropriates to his State much more, in proportion to area, than is given to other States. He says let us "halt, and return to the Constitution." Does the gentleman mean that the United States has no right to improve its rivers and harbors? Does he mean that for Congress to do this is a violation of the Constitution?

I can not agree with those who question in any way the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money for the improvement of any river which is used for navigation, or which, by improvement, can be made available for commerce between the States.

The question should and does arise in many instances as to whether the amount of commerce carried on upon a river, and therefore the benefit secured, will justify the expenditure necessary to render it navigable; but that is a mere matter of business. It is a question of expediency. It has nothing whatever to do with the power of Congress under the Constitution.

I go further. It does not make a particle of difference whether the river is wholly within one State or whether it flows through or flows into or borders upon two or more States. I insist that any river used for the purposes of commerce, even though flatboats only float upon its surface, is a river which Congress has the power to improve, without in any way violating the provisions of the Constitution. More than this: I maintain that Congress not only possesses the power to do this, but that it is an imperative duty to do it in all cases where the proposed improvement promises to result beneficially to the commercial interests of the country.

When measures are so just and proper that they can not be otherwise assailed, the

DEAR OLD CONSTITUTION

is too often used as the last resort of their opponents.

I am a constitutional Democrat, and I believe in upholding and defending that great instrument, but I do not believe in its being prostituted. No one will go further than myself in maintaining the doctrine of strict construction of the Constitution, but I am unalterably and inflexibly opposed to that narrow construction which would make it a means of prohibiting the general prosperity instead of using it for the special purpose for which it was expressly designed by its framers, namely, to promote the general welfare.

The Constitution was given us for a blessing, not for a curse. Let us sustain it, and let us use it, not as a stumbling-block, but as an aid, an incentive, in building up the fortunes of a great and prosperous nation. We have been blessed abundantly in all the sources of material wealth. Field and forest, mountain and river offer to supply us with all the necessities, the comforts, and luxuries of life, but it has pleased God, in His inscrutable wisdom, to attach to our enjoyment of these things one invariable condition—the necessity for labor. Labor must till our fields, hew our timber, dig our mines, and navigate our rivers. Labor is necessary in preparing our food, building our habitations, producing and transporting our comforts.

Barbarians in all ages have shown a disregard of this great truth; they have been content to live in caves and trackless forests, to eat unprepared food fit only for beasts, and to wear as garments the skins of wild animals. I could readily understand that this unenlightened spirit might exhibit an inclination to leave our navigable streams and harbors as they were before civilization demanded that they should that it should be unwilling to give assistance or encouragement to thousands of our worthiest citizens who are struggling nobly against most trying disadvantages.

But civilization has changed all this; and to the opponents of this bill I say: "Let us show the world that an adherence to the Constitution does not mean barbarism but civilization."

Section 8 of the Constitution says:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States.

And:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

Chief-Justice Marshall was the great expounder and defender of the Constitution. He presided over the Supreme Court for thirty-four years, and his decisions upon the meaning and construction of the Constitution have been incorporated in the jurisprudence of our country.

In McCulloch vs. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 415), Chief-Justice Marshall, n referring to the scope and design of the Constitution, declared that great instrument was "intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs."

In the same spirit and to the same effect, it was held in Hunter vs. Martin (1 Wheaton, 304) that—

The instrument (the Constitution) was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter. * * * Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mold and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and the public interests should require.

In the case of The United States vs. The New Bedford Bridge (1 Woodbury and Minot's Reports, 421) Mr. Justice Woodbury declared—

For purposes of foreign commerce and of that from State to State the navigable rivers of the whole country seem to me to be within the jurisdiction of the General Government, with all the powers over them for such purposes (whenever they chose to exercise them) which existed previously in the States or now exist with Parliament in England.

Mr. Justice Washington said, in Corfield vs. Coryell (4 Washington Circuit Court Reports, 379):

The grant to Congress to regulate commerce on the navigable waters belonging to the several States renders those waters the public property of the United States for all purposes of navigation and commercial intercourse, subject only to Congressional regulation.

In Gilman vs. Philadelphia (3 Wallace, 724) it was held—

The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the nation and subject to all the requisite legislation of Congress. This necessarily includes the power to keep them open and free from any obstruction to their navigation, interposed by the States or otherwise; to remove such obstructions when they exist; and to provide by such sanctions as they may deem proper against the recurrence of the evil and for the punishment of offenders. For these purposes Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the States before the adoption of the national Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament of England. It is for Congress to determine when its full power shall be brought into activity and as to the regulations and sanctions which shall be provided.

In 18 Howard, 421, it is distinctly asserted—

The power of Congress to regulate commerce includes the regulation of intercourse and navigation.

Story's opinion on the subject (volume 2, page 4) is to this effect:

Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more. It is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

It has been well said: "The river is but an instrument of commerce," and in Gray vs. Clinton Bridge (16 Am. Law Register, 152), it is affirmed—

The power to regulate commerce is a power to regulate the instruments of commerce.

And in Cooley vs. Board of Wardens (12 Howard, 316) we find—

It extends to the persons who conduct it, as well as to the instruments used.

In 11 Wallace, 411 and 415, the Supreme Court says:

1. A river is a navigable water of the United States when it forms by itself, or by its connection with other waters, a continuous highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

If, however, a river is not of itself a highway for commerce with other States or foreign countries, or does not form such highway by its connection with other waters, and is only navigable between different places within the State, then it is not a navigable water of the United States, but only a navigable water of the State.

An investigation of the records reveals the fact that Congress has at various times appropriated the public money to improvements in three bodies of water which under this decision are not "navigable waters of the United States." Lake Winnepisseogee and its tributaries lie wholly in the State of New Hampshire, their waters forming the chief source of the Merrimac River. A dam built at its outlet forms a reservoir of these waters, which is under the control of an incorporated company, by which the water-power is regulated and supplied to factories on the Merrimac River below. By act of June 14, 1880, Congress appropriated $5,000 to survey and improve this lake, and March 3, 1881, $2,500 additional was appropriated, and General H. G. Wright, Chief of Engineers, in his report asserts that the expenditure of this money upon this lake "has benefited three or four steamers employed mainly for summer travel."

The Yadkin River, within the limits of North Carolina, is in the same category. It is entirely cut off by a narrow mountain defile of 30 feet in width, through which it descends in a torrent, falling 50 feet in 2 miles, and has no navigable connection with its lower part, which is known as the Great Pee Dee River. And yet Congress, by acts of March 3, 1879, June 14, 1880, and March 3, 1881, has appropriated $52,000 to improve this stream, and $40,000 have been actually expended, notwithstanding the fact that "no commerce existed upon the river, and none has been developed by the improvement thus far made."

Another stream falling under this definition of the Supreme Court is the French Broad River in North Carolina. The navigable connection between the upper river and the lower, which lies in Tennessee, is prevented below Asheville by rocky rapids, with a fall of about 18 feet to the mile, which General Wright describes as "not susceptible of any practical improvement." Nevertheless, the following appropriations have been made for the improvement of this river: August 14, 1876, $10,000; June 18, 1878, $15,000; March 3, 1879, $5,000; June 14, 1880, $3,000; and March 3, 1881, $5,000; and the results accomplished by this expenditure are summarized by the Chief of Engineers in these words:

The outlet for the trade of this portion of the river is dependent upon two railroads recently completed.

There are no rivers in this bill which do not come under the requirements laid down in the decision I have quoted.

The Alabama River lies wholly within the State of Alabama, but still it is a

NAVIGABLE WATER OF THE UNITED STATES, and forms by its connection with other waters a continuous highway over which commerce may be carried on with other States. A line of steamboats might run from Montgomery to Vicksburg, or to Shreveport, or to Apalachicola, or boats might run from the headwaters of one of its tributaries to any of those cities. As a matter of fact, vessels and steamers do run from Mobile, which is situated at the mouth of the Alabama River, to different cities in the Union and to Europe, and the freight they carry is largely composed of the goods, wares, and merchandise which is brought down the Alabama. It would therefore be absurd to hold that Congress is forbidden by the Constitution to appropriate public money to make any needed improvement in the navigation of the Alabama River because it lies wholly within the boundaries of a single State, and the same rule holds regarding its affluents; and whether they be narrow or broad, deep or shallow, Congress has a right under the Constitution to appropriate money for their improvement, and if the commerce upon such river is such as to make its improvement a judicious measure I insist it is the duty of Congress to make the necessary appropriation.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. Calhoun, in 1824, when Secretary of War, referred to the proposed canal around Muscle Shoals as third in rank among the projected improvements of national importance, and in 1828 a survey was made by a board of United States engineers.

General Andrew Jackson crossed the Tennessee River at or near the Muscle Shoals repeatedly during his Indian campaigns early in the century. With the keen perception, rapid comprehension, and prompt decision which distinguished him, that great man at once saw the necessity for removing this obstruction to the navigation of the river, and appreciated the propriety of this being done by the General Government. Consequently when he became President he called the attention of Congress to its importance, and it was under his direction that another survey of the river with a view to its improvement was made by Col. S. H. Long, United States topographical engineer, in 1830. It appears that Congress had recognized the great necessity of the work to which General Jackson had called attention, and in 1828 donated 400,000 acres of land to the State of Alabama, the proceeds of which were to be applied to the construction of a canal around these shoals and around Colbert Shoals, 24 miles below.

An imperfect and narrow canal was constructed around the main obstruction only—Big Muscle Shoals—but before anything was done at other points some of the dams gave way, and there being no funds to repair them the old canal fell into disuse. It was estimated that to rebuild it and extend the improvement to Little Muscle and Elk River Shoals would involve an outlay of $4,000,000, and the whole work was abandoned.

The present project consists of a series of locks each 300 feet long by 60 feet wide in the chamber, and from 6 to 13 feet lift, the side walls being from 14 to 21 feet high. Nine of these locks are required for the main canal, all of which have been built. They are constructed of heavy cut-stone and rubble masonry, and are founded upon solid rock. The masonry is all completed, and the massive iron gates, made of boiler-iron, are being placed in position.

As this important work is in my district I have taken special pains to familiarize myself with its details. I have passed over the work several times accompanied by the engineer in charge, and my remarks concerning its recent progress and present condition are based upon actual and often-repeated observation.

This great improvement possesses features which commend it to the favorable consideration of Congress, and which are not to be found in any other public work.

When completed it will connect by water navigation all the States which lie upon the Mississippi and its tributaries with Alabama and Georgia and with East Tennessee, and supplemented with a short line of railway it will bring the entire Northwest in communication with all the States of the Southeast, opening an annual trade amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars, giving this amount in money to the States of the Northwest in exchange for their products.

This obstruction hermetically seals this 700 miles of navigable water from the rest of the world. Already $2,000,000 have been expended on this work under the direction of the officials of the State of Alabama, and $2,295,500 by the General Government, and from this large outlay directly or indirectly until it is finished. No benefit whatever can be derived from this large investment until the whole obstruction is removed. On the contrary, the work already done will constantly deteriorate in value, while the country loses the interest on the large expenditure already incurred during every year of unnecessary delay.

To give any value to the work already done at Muscle Shoals the whole improvement must be absolutely completed; a continuous water way must be rendered available from Knoxville to the Ohio River. This water way must be made available as a highway of commerce, for a single impassable obstruction, demanding transshipment of freight, or interfering in any way with the traffic on the river, like the weakest link in the chain which measures the strength of the chain, will be the measure of the value of the river as a commercial highway.

To leave the work as it is now would be the same thing, in principle, as if a railroad company should start to bore a tunnel through a mountain and should suspend operations when within a few feet of the farther edge of the mountain.

The Little Muscle Shoals obstruction has been practically removed.

THE MAIN CANAL TRUNK,

14½ miles long, has been enlarged and deepened by heavy rock cutting and earth excavation. Twenty-five stone piers and two abutments for an aqueduct at Shoal Creek have been built, besides piers for bridges, masonry for water weirs, &c.

The Elk River Shoals improvement consists of two locks and about a mile and a half of canal, which, together with heavy stone dams and rock excavation, are nearly completed. All the stone for these locks has been quarried and cut, and the masonry of the locks is at this time nearly completed, and the excavation of the canal trunk is far advanced.

The entire amount expended on the Tennessee River between Chattanooga and Paducah has been $2,695,500, of which amount about $2,300,000 has been expended at Muscle Shoals. This does not include the $2,000,000 spent by the State of Alabama, which has proved of very little practical benefit.

With the amount asked for this year, $350,000, the entire improvement can be made available and the passage of boats through the obstruction secured. The whole of the work required for this great improvement will be completed at a cost far inside of the original estimate, made in 1873, which was $4,133,000, notwithstanding the fact that the appropriations have been only about one-third of the annual estimates, which of course adds to the cost of all such works.

The canal when finished

WILL LAST FOR CENTURIES,

and will be available at all seasons of the year. Though nothing should be done toward removing the minor obstructions in the river, it will yet be navigable for a longer period during the year than most of our Northern rivers are free from ice.

Next in importance to Muscle Shoals, which, of course, should be first provided for, comes Colbert Shoals, where at very little expense additional work can be done with the most advantageous results. All the other obstructions are of minor consequence, and even if they are not disturbed the river can be safely navigated during at least nine months of the year.

It is a fact not generally known, and perhaps, therefore, inadequately appreciated, that the Tennessee River has a better low-water channel than the Ohio, and that its regimen is much more permanent. The bottom is generally of rock, and the banks are almost invariably protected by rock or by a dense growth of vegetation.

The importance of—I think I am justified in saying the necessity for—this improvement will be rendered apparent by the following facts, to which I ask the careful attention of the House. The territory which is shut off from traffic with the remainder of the United States by the obstruction to navigation at Muscle Shoals embraces an area of about 56,000 square miles, comprising North Alabama, part of Middle Tennessee, all of East Tennessee, and portions of Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia.

The country above the Muscle Shoals is abundantly supplied with the following trees which are needed in the Northwest: White, red, and post oak, ash, hickory, locust, birch, cherry, gum, black walnut, maple, red cedar, holly, beech, white and yellow poplar, and yellow and long-leaf pine.

The marble obtained in East Tennessee is abundant and its quality is unsurpassed by any in the United States. Gold, nickel, silver, zinc, copper, lead, fire-clay, building-stone, sandstone, and limestone are here found, rich in quality, abundant and easy of access.

The greater part of the land in this immense area is very

RICH AND HIGHLY PRODUCTIVE,

the principal products being cotton, cereals, and stock. The annual product of that portion of the Tennessee Valley above these shoals may be stated in round numbers as follows:

Wheat	bushels...	9,000,000
Corn	do.....	30,000,000
Oats	bushels...	5,000,000
Hay	tons...	200,000
Cotton	bales...	70,000
Live stock	value...	$30,000,000
Forest products	do.....	$500,000

And it should be borne in mind that this has been and is being produced by a people who realize the fact that they can not hope for any commercial relations with the rest of their countrymen except by the comparatively expensive method of railroad transportation. Remove the impassable obstruction presented by these shoals, and give them the benefits of uninterrupted, continuous, and cheap water navigation to foster and stimulate their enterprise, and in a very few years the production of their fair and fertile territory will be doubled.

But this is the least of the great benefits which will be derived from the opening of navigation on the Tennessee River. The immense beds of coal which lie near the banks of this river in North Alabama and Tennessee are sufficient to supply the world. The mountains of iron ore, excellent in quality, will find a market when this water way is opened to them, and will enrich nearly every State in the Union.

It will be gratifying to the scientific world to learn that only last week of ores found within easy access of that city. If ever there was a case in which the expenditure of the people's money was demanded by the people's interest it is this case. It will be of great benefit and advantage to the people of my district, I know, but its benefits and advantages must of necessity extend to a number of citizens and tax-payers so vast that the numbers in any single district seem insignificant in comparision.

BESSEMER STEEL WAS MADE IN CHATTANOOGA

To thinking minds the advantages of river improvements are so apparent as to require no argument. Besides compelling railway companies to give reasonable rates to the people, they furnish means for the transportation of cheap and bulky commodities, such as timber, lumber, pig-iron, coal, and building stone; and it is a fact worthy of notice that most of the members of Congress and most of the papers who make war upon the river and harbor bill are located in sections that have already secured liberal appropriations for improvements, or else their constituents are deeply interested in the profits of railroad transportation.

To give some idea of the capacity of water navigation, I would call attention to the fact that while the Erie Canal was delivering 37,500,000 bushels of grain at New York, all the railroads which centered there, including the four-tracked Central, were delivering only 28,000,000.

We certainly might take a lesson from the European nations on the subject of water way improvements, and in calling attention to some of them I will commence with

FRANCE.

Up to the time that Bonaparte became the First Consul of France, at the end of the last century, the low-water depth of the Seine was only 2½ feet, and up to 1850 4 feet of water was considered as a good navigable condition. About this time numerous locks and weirs were constructed between Paris and Rouen to increase the depth. At first plans were made for 5 feet; they were then changed to provide for 6½ feet; and finally the importance of the improvement became so apparent that in 1878 it was decreed to so extend the works as to secure a draught of 10½ feet, so that vessels of 800 tons burden could at all times ascend the river to Paris. The estimated cost of these improvements is about $8,500,000.

The improvements of the Rhone are also important. A canal 2 miles long, near its mouth, was completed in 1862, at a cost of more than $3,000,000. It is 200 miles from Lyons to the Mediterranean, in which distance the average fall per mile is 32 inches. The river is navigable for vessels of considerable burden except in extreme low water, when the depth in many places is only 3 feet. A grant of $9,000,000 has already been obtained to improve the river below Lyons, so as to insure a depth of 5 feet 3 inches at the lowest water. The estimated cost of the entire improvement is about $12,000,000.

Mr. Krantz, a member of the National Assembly, made a report in 1872 showing that up to that time there had been expended for constructing canals and improving rivers more than $230,000,000; and notwithstanding this enormous antecedent outlay a bill was introduced in the chamber of deputies in 1878 for further systematizing and improving internal navigation, at an estimated additional expenditure of—

For rivers	$13,000,000
For canals	142,600,000
For harbors	20,000,000
Making in all	175,600,000

Mr. Krantz reported the cost of transportation as being about one-half of 1 cent per ton per mile for canals and about two-thirds of 1 cent per ton per mile for rivers. It must be recollected that France is only three-fourths as large as Texas, and notwithstanding her good facilities for inland navigation she profitably runs over 18,000 miles of railroad.

RUSSIA HAS THE BEST

natural inland navigation of any country in Europe. She has 19,000 miles of navigable water way and 38,000 miles of raft-bearing rivers. The Volga is 2,000 miles in length, and drains an area 563,000 square miles in extent, and, with its tributaries, affords 7,200 miles of navigation. The Ural has a course of 1,446 miles, and drains 95,000 square miles of territory. The Dnieper is 1,060 miles long and drains 204,000 square miles. The Petchora, Dwina, Bug, Dniester, Neva, and Duna are also important rivers, draining together some 300,000 square miles.

Notwithstanding this vast natural inland water way, and notwithstanding the fact that nearly all rivers in Russia are closed by ice during the long winter months—from October to May in the North and from November to April in the South—the Russian Government has inaugurated and prosecuted a well-considered system of artificial canals, whereby the whole country is traversed by water from end to end.

The Saint Petersburg canal alone has cost $7,000,000, and 900 miles other canals have been constructed.

ITALY IS NOT RICH

in waterways, the only one of any considerable value being the valley of the Po. The navigable portion of all her rivers aggregates only about 1,100 miles. The Italians were among the first people in modern Europe who attempted to plan and execute the construction of canals; but the total length of their navigable canals is now only 435 miles.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY

possesses in the Danube and its three hundred affluents a series of water courses which extend so as to drain 316,000 square miles of territory; and notwithstanding these great natural advantages the government has expended millions upon millions of dollars to improve this river and to afford commercial facilities to those sections of the country where navigation was obstructed. One single cut of only 10 miles in length, which was made to shorten the river 1½ miles, cost the government $16,000,000; and this is but one item of the vast sum expended to render this great stream a practicable highway of commerce.

GERMANY,

with an area a little larger than that of France and with 22,000 miles of railroad, has already spent more than $20,000,000 upon a stream not larger than the Clinch, and yet we find people calling it extravagant because since the beginning of the Government we have spent on that river about $14,000.

HOLLAND.

Holland, with only 2,128 square miles of territory—about the size of the State of Delaware—has expended upon three public works $32,000,000. The new mouth of the Maas (or Meuse) cost $12,500,000; the North Holland Canal cost $4,500,000; and the North Sea and Amsterdam Canal cost the government $15,000,000.

BELGIUM.

The little country of Belgium has expended in round figures $20,000,000 on dock and river improvements. She has an area of 11,378 square miles—about the size of the State of New Hampshire—and profitably runs 2,700 miles of railway in spite of the competition from her water ways.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Notwithstanding the fact that she profitably supports 19,000 miles of railway, and that all the chief rivers of the United Kingdom are mostly arms of the sea, navigable for considerable distances at high water by the largest vessels, and notwithstanding the fact that her size is less than half that of the State of Texas, I have before me official reports showing that up to 1844 she had expended more than $100,000,000 to improve her inland navigation.

The average actual cost of transportation on all English water ways is estimated to be about one-half of 1 cent per ton per mile.

When we consider that the United States is more than three hundred times as large as Belgium or Holland, more than thirty times as large as Great Britain, and eighteen times as large as Germany or France, it is hardly creditable to us to have to admit that our entire expenditures for rivers and harbors from the beginning of the Government until June 30, 1882, have amounted to $111,300,000.

To show how this money has been distributed among the States I have arranged a table from the figures given by the Secretary of War in his report, which was transmitted to Congress by the President.

Table showing the aggregate appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, from the beginning of the Government, March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1882, as shown by the report of the Secretary of War, transmitted to Congress by the President of the United States January 22, 1884.

Since this report was made the law of 1882 appropriated $18,988,875, and the law of 1884 appropriated $13,949,200, giving a grand total of expenditures for this purpose since the establishment of the Government of $144,237,539.

The appropriations charged directly to the States refer only to the harbors and rivers that are wholly within the several States; and those improvements which are designed to benefit two or more of the States are grouped together in one aggregate, under the head "Miscellaneous."

I desire now to give a minute

DESCRIPTION OF THE MUSCLE SHOALS

improvement; and to do this, I beg to call attention to a map explaining this great work.

The river flows from the right to the left of the map. The navigation for large steamboats is good from Knoxville to the head of this obstruction, a distance of more than 350 miles.

Commencing about 1 mile below the head of Brown's Island, on the right of the map, about 12 miles below Decatur, a solid rock bottom forms a series of reefs, which for all time, except in periods of floods, have been a complete bar to navigation. The plan adopted has been by means of coffer-dams to blast out the rock from the bottom of the river, the excavated rock being used to construct a wall on either side of the channel thus secured, the channel being sufficiently wide to allow the largest boats to pass each other at full speed.

This portion of the work is entirely completed, and to give some idea of the amount of labor involved I will mention that it required the excavation of much more than 1,000,000 cubic feet of very hard silicious rock.

This character of improvement continues from the point indicated by the figure 1 down to the point indicated by the figure 3, a distance of 2 miles. The natural channel of the river has sufficient water for navigation from this point to the foot of Brown's Island, at the point indicated by the figure 4½, a distance of 1½ miles. From the lower end of Brown's Island a wall has been constructed to confine the water between itself and the southern shore. This wall extends to the point indicated by the figure 7, a distance of 2½ miles. It raises the water and secures a for all purposes of navigation. This work also required excavations of rock for some distance below the western or lower extremity of Brown's Island. At the point indicated by the figure 7 a first-class lock is being constructed, called Lock A. From this point a canal has been excavated for nearly 1½ miles to the point indicated by the letter "B," where another lock is nearly completed. One of these locks has a lift of 12 feet, and the other from 5 to 10 feet lift, according to the stage of water in the river. From Lock B the slough between Gilchrist Island and the shore has been improved a distance of 3 miles, to Nance's Reef, which will be seen on the map at the figures 11. This reef has been removed by solid rock excavations. From this point we have deep water for a distance of 4½ miles to the point indicated by the figures 15½. Here commences the main canal, 14½ miles long. The total fall of the river in this 14½ miles is 84½ feet; at some points the fall is very great, being 18 feet in one single mile, and at other points the fall, for short distances, is at the rate of 40 feet to the mile, giving the river the appearance of a roaring torrent.

To be more minute in the description of this canal, I will call the attention of the House to its mouth at the point indicated by the figures 15½. Then running down to the point marked 16 we come to the the aggregate lift of which is 84½ feet, the lift of most of them being either 10 or 12 feet. They are 60 feet wide, and 300 feet between the gates. The canal, when completed, will be from 70 to 120 feet wide, with 7 feet of water, and will pass boats 60 feet wide, 300 feet long, and drawing 6 feet of water. At the point marked 18 is lock No. 2, the distance between the first two locks being 2 miles. Two miles further down the river, at the point marked 20, is lock No. 3. A mile and a half below is lock No. 4. Two miles below this is lock No. 5. The original plan of the work contemplated another lock, to be numbered 6, but the fall of water was found to be such that this lock was omitted. The next completed lock is No. 7, at the point indicated by 28.

This lock is 4½ miles from lock No. 5. One mile farther down we come to Shoal Creek, which the canal crosses by means of an aqueduct. The construction of this part of the work required the building of twenty-seven stone piers and abutments, each of which is 75 feet long and their average height is 11 feet. The iron beams for the trunk of the aqueduct are 32 feet long and 17¾ inches deep. As these beams could not be cast in this country, they were contracted for in Belgium. Their total weight is about 600 tons.

After crossing the aqueduct, we come to lock No. 8, and three-quarters of a mile farther down to lock No. 9; one-quarter of a mile from the latter is lock No. 10. Lock No. 8 is 12 feet lift, and locks Nos. 9 and 10 are each 10 feet lift. Between locks 8 and 10 the natural fall of water is 18 feet in a single mile, and between locks 9 and 10 it is about 10 feet in a quarter of a mile. Lock No. 10 is the western mouth of the canal, and from that point the river is improved by means of dams confining the water to the north of Jackson's Island, and also to the north of the island below Jackson's Island. A number of wing-dams have also been constructed, extending from Jackson's Island on the south, and also from the right bank of the river on the north.

In order that the people of the Northern States may more fully understand the detriment caused by this impenetrable bar to navigation in a large river I will state that its effect is the same as would be produced by an impassable some 40 or 50 miles above New York. The Cascades in Columbia River is the only other work in the United States like the Muscle Shoals which has for its purpose the opening, and not merely the improvement, of navigation. The Muscle Shoals affect twenty times the number of people and involve interests one hundred times greater than those involved in the great and important project in Oregon; and yet the appropriation for the Columbia River reached $1,000,000, and the Chief Engineer informs us that $1,250,000 more is needed to open navigation at that point. I am in favor of the work; every member of this House ought to vote for it; and one hundred times more important is the great canal improvement of the Muscle Shoals.

OBSTRUCTION IN THE HUDSON RIVER

I will now give a table showing the entire expenditures of the General Government on the Tennessee River, from its source to where it empties into the Ohio, near Paducah.

The appropriations by the General Government for the improvement of the Tennessee River have been as follows:

Object of appropriation.	Date.	Amount.
Survey	Mar. 2, 1827	$200
Improvement of navigation	Aug. 30, 1852	50,000
Contracts under above	June 12, 1860	2,756
Improvement below Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1871	80,000
Continuation of work below Chattanooga	June 10, 1872	50,000
Improvement between Knoxville and Chattanooga	June 10, 1872	25,000
Improvement below Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1873	100,000
Improvement above Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1873	25,000
Continuing improvement above Chattanooga	June 23, 1874	25,000
Continuing improvement below Chattanooga	June 23, 1874	100,000
Continuing improvement below Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1875	300,000
Continuing improvement above Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1875	40,000
Continuing improvement above Chattanooga	Aug. 14, 1876	15,000
Continuing improvement at Muscle Shoals	Aug. 14, 1876	255 000
Continuing improvement above Chattanooga	June 18, 1878	15,000
Continuing improvement below Chattanooga, $15,000, or any necessary part for Duck River Shoals	June 18, 1878	300,000
Improvement above Chattanooga	Mar. 3, 1879	11,500

Is it not painful, Mr. Chairman, to see an improvement so important as this dragging along with petty appropriations from 1827 to the present time—a period of almost sixty years?

THE PROFIT AND ADVANTAGE to the people of the United States from a single year's use of this water way would far more than compensate for every dollar expended in making it available, and yet gentlemen hesitate about appropriating this meager sum, which is all that is required to carry this important undertaking to successful completion.

When this work of improvement was commenced, more than half a century ago, false economy necessitated a plan of construction so faulty and inadequate that it resulted in the almost total waste and loss of the entire $2,000,000 expended at that time. After the failure of this ill-conceived and poorly executed project, the attempt was abandoned and no effort was made to remove this impassable obstruction to the navigation of the Tennessee River until about ten years ago, when, after careful estimates, it was reported that $4,133,000 would be required to complete the improvement.

By a system of rigid economy and watchful care in every branch of the expenditure—saving a lock in one place, taking advantage of deep water in another, and by donations of land, rock, and timber by poor but public-spirited citizens in the immediate vicinity, it is now definitely settled that the work will be completed at an outlay far within the original estimates.

Up to February, 1884, about $2,000,000 had been expended which could properly be charged to Muscle Shoals. Accompanied by the engineer in charge, I again visited the work, and he determined and reported that with $700,000 the work could be completed.

A convention was called, and met in Chattanooga on March 12,

CONSISTING OF FIVE HUNDRED DELEGATES from North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio. This convention adopted resolutions, which I will read:

Whereas the General Government has already heretofore appropriated about $2,345,000, which has been mostly expended in the work of removing obstructions from the river at the Muscle Shoals; and

Whereas the official report of the engineer in charge of the work on the Muscle Shoals shows that the work thereon has been suspended because the appropriation heretofore made has been exhausted, leaving a vast amount of material on hand unused which is deteriorating in value: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That inasmuch as the Tennessee River and its tributaries can not be improved and made navigable without Congressional aid, we respectfully but firmly call upon Congress at the earliest practicable moment to make such appropriation as will carry to completion the improvements in question.

Resolved, That we are of the opinion that Congress will, if properly approached, not in a dictatorial but respectful manner, grant us our request.

Resolved, That in view of this we urge our committee on memorial to organize at once and proceed to Washington to present our claims; that they remain there as long as practicable and use every means and appliance in their power to bring about the result we so ardently desire.

As a member of the committee I visited Washington in March and April, 1884, bringing with me and exhibiting to the Congressional committees a mammoth map of this work, of which the map I now present is a reduced copy. The committees of the two Houses received us most courteously, patiently and attentively listened to and considered our representations, and generously granted us an appropriation of $350,000. This sum has been expended most advantageously and economically, and with the amount appropriated by this bill the iron gates for all the locks can be completed and adjusted, the canal placed in working order, and navigation opened throughout the entire length of one of the most important rivers in the United States, and this will have been accomplished, mark you, at an expenditure less than three-fourths of the amount estimated by the engineer who commenced the work. The country to be benefited by this great improvement bestowed upon the most favored lands. Minerals, rich in quality and well-nigh inexhaustible in quantity, invite the miner's industry and the artisan's formative skill. Farms so fertile and easy of cultivation that they yield a generous return to the toil of the husbandman skirt the banks of the beautiful Tennessee, and if by passing this bill you assure them the blessing of continuous and cheap water transportation the bountiful products of these smiling fields will seek the markets of the world. The same boon will render the timber, marble, and building-rock of this prolific region available for the purposes of commerce, and they too will be added to the material elements of civilization.

THE SOUTH IS PROGRESSING,

Mr. Chairman; her advance in all that makes a people great, rich, and prosperous is evidenced by no faltering or uncertain signs. She is coming—not to injuriously compete with our sister States of the North, but by her growing prosperity to aid them in the great strides they are taking toward unquestionable supremacy in the commercial and industrial affairs of the world. For twenty years we have toiled and struggled under circumstances more adverse than ever were encountered by any people. We have met stumbling-blocks at every step along the toilsome pathway leading from our political and commercial slough of despond.

Our adversities have been bitter, our disappointments both severe and frequent, but we have passed through the fires, not unscorched but undismayed, and we come, purified and encouraged, to take our place abreast of those who lead in the march of progress and improvement.

The old men of the South who built up our beloved land—and whose unselfish efforts and stainless characters are our priceless heritage—have been laid in honored graves by the reverent hands of their loving children. They saw the work of a century destroyed in a moment. They saw the laborers of their country transformed from producers into politicians. They saw a party in power which by every possible means turned the tide of prosperity and immigration from their doors. They saw millions of acres of the public domain given to corporations who sent their agents to every port in Europe and America to direct the stream of living wealth to these lands in the Great West.

Although our country is the most productive in its soil and the richest in its minerals, the immigrant was taught to shun it as blighted and impoverished. Although our climate is healthy and salubrious, he was led to regard it as dangerous, if not deadly; and in addition he was impressed with the belief that the powerful hand of the Government was against us.

All this is now changed.

THE YOUNG MEN OF THE SOUTH

are pressing forward in the race for prosperity with energy, vigor, and determination. The unequal struggle of their sires in the face of every adversity is continually before them. They remember their last admonitions to be self-reliant and industrious.

The political ban which for so many years hung like a pall over our country has been lifted, and now the Southern States stand side by side with their sister States of the North.

Mr. Cleveland, God bless him, lifted this weight, and he now stretches out his strong arm to shield the youthful toilers of our land, and his triumphant election in trumpet tones proclaimed that the era of invidious and oppressive distinctions between the sections has passed; that the sovereign and equal rights of all the States must be maintained.

I am proud, Mr. Chairman, to be able to say that I stand here to-day one of those chosen to represent on this floor a State animated by this new-born energy, this re-created earnestness of purpose, this resuscitated hopefulness of our Southern youth, and I ask the American Congress to afford them the opportunity to achieve the rescue of their land from the burdens it has so long and patiently endured. I ask it, not as a boon to be granted at the expense of others, but I claim and assert that unobstructed river navigation and unrestricted commercial privileges are the inherent and inalienable rights of every community in this broad land, where unequal burdens can only be imposed by positive violation of the spirit of our institutions.

Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Osage River, Missouri: Continuing improvement by snagging and removing obstructions, $10,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out that paragraph. I would like to inquire why the appropriation in this bill is $10,000, when the engineer suggests only $5,000 can be properly expended. By referring to the report of engineers it will be seen the following language is used:

From these facts it appears that there are no interests at this time, either upon the Osage River itself or upon its banks, which will justify a heavy expenditure in the improvement of the river.

Will the gentleman explain why it is, when the engineer reports only $5,000 can be used properly, there is an appropriation here of $10,000?

Mr. BLAND. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Iowa there was a supplemental report by the Chief of Engineers recommending the increased amount appropriated in the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Missouri state what particular kind of a derrick he got under the engineers before that supplemental report was made? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. I leave that to the gentleman to inquire.

Mr. WILLIS. The business on this river is over $1,000,000 per annum, and this is a small appropriation.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not occupied the floor of the House one instant during the proceeding on this river and harbor bill, but there have been used on this floor expressions which I think have not been sufficiently answered. For a moment permit me therefore to call attention to them, and I wish to be perfectly kind and respectful.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] preached almost a funeral address upon the Republic, using this bill as his text. Now another member from New York [Mr. VIELE], who also represents that great metropolis, has introduced a bill which when matured will cause an expenditure of at least one-half the amount provided for in this bill. I refer to the proposition introduced by General VIELE for the purpose of investigating the harbor of New York and the improvement of the channels leading to that great city. I believe that measure to be perfectly legitimate.

Competent engineers have told me, and repeatedly, that this can not be done under seven millions of money. I do not believe it will cost less than ten. That proposition, sir, is planted in this bill, and the gentleman from New York made no criticism upon it.

The gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber [Mr. HISCOCK], from the same great State of New York, has chosen to hold up this bill to the country as a shame, when he at the same time, and I believe honestly, presented an amendment himself looking to the acquisition by this Government of all the canals of New York, which would cost not less than $100,000,000.

The Erie Canal itself, I learn, cost the great State of New York $82,000,000. If the gentleman is in earnest, and I take it we do not come here to trifle with each other or the country, he means that his proposition would lead to the acquisition for the use of this Government of these works created by the State of New York. I simply wish to raise this question, to make this inquiry, to know if there is any consistency in such actions. I believe in doing all we can to promote the transportation interests of the country. I believe this bill provides in a large degree for them. It is one of the smallest appropriation bills that passes the House. It is not comparable at all to the great pension appropriation bill, carrying seventy or seventy-five millions of dollars annually at one fell swoop, and to it we make no objection. It is not so great as the Army bill, nor does it involve such an amount as the naval appropriation bill. It is the smallest of all, and carries the greatest benefit to the country I believe.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. KING.

Mr. KING. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina, but I shall not detain the committee any longer.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Red River of the North, Minnesota: Continuing improvement; and the money heretofore appropriated for locks and dams is hereby made available for dredging at Goose Rapids, according to the plan of the Chief of Engineers, recommended on the 12th of March, 1884: Provided, That not exceeding $30,000 shall be thus expended on Goose Rapids.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in line 968, the words "at Goose Rapids" and insert "said river."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Yellowstone River between Glendive and the mouth, Montana: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad we have reached the Yellowstone. I happen to know something about that river, for I have visited it. Three years since I tried to catch trout in it, but my efforts were about as fruitless as will be this appropriation for the improvement of its navigation.

I must congratulate the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, however, that having exhausted all the creeks and inlets in the States, they have at last gone into the Territories in their colossal attempt to deplete the Treasury. Their action has a tendency to refute the rumor quite prevalent throughout the country that this bill was made up to catch votes. As the Delegates from Montana and Dakota have no votes on this floor, the appropriation for the Yellowstone must have been an act of unselfish patriotism on the part of the committee.

The Yellowstone is one of the most beautiful streams I ever saw. Its waters are like those of the "bright Juniata" and as they rush over their pebbled bed they gleam in the sunlight with a silvery sheen that both attracts and fascinates the eye. But, sir, the course of the river is crooked and its current swift, the inevitable effect of which is to throw up shoals of gravel at the more abrupt turns. It is no doubt to remove these numerous shoals that the engineer in charge calls for a steam dredge and a tug at a cost of $35,000 and $25,000 a year additional to operate them.

Mr. Chairman, it may be possible to improve the navigation of this river. The Chief of Engineers says that it is, and I am willing to take his word for it. But what good will it do? What benefit will it be?

One would think that this is a very important question to be determined before we enter upon an undertaking which may involve us in an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars. And yet all that the engineer says upon that point is, "The commerce of the river is insignificant." I can fully corroborate this statement, for during my stay of a week or more in the vicinity, and during my travel on the cars for miles along the river, I never saw so much as a raft or canoe on its waters. I doubt if any one else ever has.

Mr. Chairman, the Yellowstone is fairly typical of numerous other so-called rivers in this bill. Appropriations are made for thirty-nine streams, with unpronounceable names, not one of which can be found on the maps in ordinary use. They are probably used as wagon-roads during the droughts of summer and utilized in times of freshet for transportation of logs and rafts. It is proposed by these appropriations, and others to follow hereafter, to make them navigable at all seasons of the year. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors think, no doubt, that if we can only cover these gravel beds with a perpetual body of water we will enlarge the fields of commerce and give a lasting boom to the log industry.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to it, and for reasons which I will state as briefly as possible.

Very few of the rivers whose navigation is sought to be bettered by the appropriations in this bill are susceptible of permanent improvement. Most of them are of rapid current, subject to sudden and great rise during the spring and fall freshets, and liable to sedimentary deposits. All attempts to control the channel, or protect the banks, or deepen the water by dredging or otherwise, are consequently of but temporary value.

The elements in their occasional outbursts are beyond the control of man. We are all familiar with the irresistible force of fire, wind, and water. We have had very recently in the Northwest an exhibition of what the tornado can do when it goes to work in down-right earnest. And we have also seen what the Mississippi and other Western rivers can do when swollen into angry tumult by repeated rains. What they have done in the past they will continue to do in the future, and experience should teach us the utter futility of trying to check them. Eventually we will come to the conclusion, and I trust we will do it before we squander too much of the people's money, that we had better let the rivers have their own way, and let them flow unmolested to the sea.

Mr. Chairman, I have given this subject of water transportation considerable study and I have very strong convictions upon it. I have found that during the last twenty-five years a sharp fight has been going on between the water ways and the railways. The water ways have been steadily losing ground and they are bound to go to the wall. Steam on the land will supersede steam on the water. It has already nearly destroyed the canal commerce, and within twenty years it will have conquered the river commerce. Why, sir, to-day the Louisville and Nashville Railroad is a far more important channel of commerce than the Mississippi River. Gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere who are constantly magnifying the water routes are probably not aware that the tonnage over the bridge at Saint Louis is ten times greater than that under it on the river. They shut their eyes to the fact that in fifteen years' time the tonnage of three great trunk lines between the lakes and the ocean increased from 10,000,000 to over 46,000,000; whereas the tonnage of the water route fell off from 6,000,000 to under 5,000,000. They forget that 1,953 miles of canals, which cost $44,013,166 to construct, have been wholly abandoned.

In view of these facts, and others I have cited on former occasions on this floor, I feel convinced that the inland commerce of our country will be conducted in the early future by the railroads exclusively. Hence all appropriations for our rivers are unwise.

Mr. Chairman, the only plausible answer I have ever heard to the position I hold upon this question is, that the maintenance of the water ways acts as a check upon the rapacity of the railroads. The answer, however, is only plausible. As matter of fact the railroads can carry as cheap as the canals or rivers, and it is our duty to put them in legislative harness and make them. By enforcing fair dealing in construction and economy in operation, prohibiting stock-watering, construction companies, and consolidation agreements, the railroads of the future can be capitalized at a sum which will yield a fair return for the money invested, and give shippers cheaper transportation than that afforded by water.

Mr. Chairman, I have never yet voted for a river and harbor bill, and I shall not vote for this one. I do not approve of spending the people's money in this way. I think we would be justified in making appropriations—liberal appropriations—for the improvement of our seacoast harbors, but I would leave inland navigation to take care of itself. Let the fight between the natural ways and the artificial ways go on independent of legislative assistance. Private capital and private enterprise will settle it before long, and settle it, as I believe, to the satisfaction of the great mass of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Sacramento and Feather Rivers, California, $40,000, of the money heretofore appropriated for improving said rivers that may remain unexpended at the end of the present fiscal year: Provided, That no money shall be expended on said improvement, except what may be needed for snagging and dredging, until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that hydraulic-mining obstructions shall have ceased on said rivers and their tributaries. And the Secretary of War is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent further deposit of sluicing and débris from the hydraulic mines situated upon said Sacramento and Feather Rivers and their tributaries, and also the San Joaquin River and its tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary to carry the above provision into effect.

Mr. WILLIS. There are some verbal amendments which are proposed by the committee to this section which I will send to the desk.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the necessity for reappropriating the amount which may remain unexpended at the end of the fiscal year? I understand that the two-year provision does not apply to these improvements——

Mr. WILLIS. The necessity in this case is that this appropriation was tied up by the original provision making it, because it was not to be expended while this hydraulic mining was in progress, and it is to release that appropriation to a certain extent that this is inserted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is not then for the purpose of saving it from being covered back at the end of the two years?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by the committee, as follows:

Strike out from and including line 981 to and including line 993 and insert the following:

"The end of the present fiscal year, for sinking and dredging operations and the cost of the proceedings hereinafter authorized, the balance of said unexpended money, not to be used until the Secretary of War be satisfied that hydraulic mining has ceased on the said rivers and their tributaries; if he be not so satisfied he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by streams or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of such sum as much as may be necessary for such purpose."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving the Upper Columbia River, including Snake River, Oregon and Washington Territory: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1001, strike out $10,000 and insert $36,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I find in the report of the engineers that up to the 30th day of June, 1885, $227,470.64 have been expended in the prosecution of this improvement. The engineers estimate that the amount required for the completion of the existing project is $36,000. The amount that could be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is $36,000. The plan of this improvement is to remove the stone and the rock with which Snake River and Columbia River at certain points are filled. It seems to me it would be a wise piece of work on the part of this committee to give to this improvement the full amount estimated by the engineers. I am aware that because of my lack of voting power I can not expect the same consideration as some other gentlemen on this floor, but I nevertheless insist that the committee should look upon Washington Territory in precisely the manner which its vast interests demand. We have in Washington Territory nearly 2,000 miles of coast line and nearly 1,000 miles of navigable rivers, and yet in Washington Territory proper the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have seen fit to give us just $14,500. I hope the amendment will be favorably considered.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say that the action taken by the committee is in no way shaken by the remarks of the gentleman from Washington Territory. We have given as liberally as the estimates of the engineers justified. It appears by the report that there was an amount of $8,398 on hand. We have given nearly one-third of the amount estimated. The river is closed with ice for a good part of the time, and at other times the water is in that condition that work can not be carried on. And looking on what has been done in past years we thought the amount in the bill was as much money as could be economically expended.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. VOORHEES, there were—ayes 29, noes 53.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Chehalis River, Washington Territory: Continuing improvement, $2,500.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1015, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say but a word in support of this amendment. The estimate of the engineers for this improvement was $5,000 and they asked for $5,000. When the committee takes into consideration the fact that these operations are snagging operations and that $2,500 will not begin to relieve this river of the snags which now form impediments to navigation, the importance of appropriating a sufficient sum of money to carry out this purpose will be readily apparent. I ask for a favorable consideration of the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Cowlitz River, Washington Territory: Continuing improvement, $2,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

In line 1017, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$6,000."

Mr. VOORHEES. This amendment seems to me to stand upon a different basis if possible from those I have heretofore offered. I read from the report of the engineers:

The project for this improvement, adopted in 1880, consists in wing-dam construction, bar-scraping, and snagging operations, to secure light-draught navigation up to Toledo, a little more than 30 miles above the mouth.

The original estimate for this work was $3,000 for construction in the first year, and an annual expenditure thereafter of $2,000 for maintenance by snagging operations.

The total appropriation to date is $6,000. The amount expended to end of fiscal year is $5,988.13. During the year 300 feet of wing-dam have been constructed, and the channel has been maintained in tolerably good condition.

It is proposed to apply the sum asked for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, to channel maintenance, wing-dam construction, and shore protection.

The amount, estimated, required for the completion of the existing project the engineers say is $3,000. For annual maintenance there will be required $3,000, making a total of $6,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have appropriated $2,000—less than what would be sufficient according to the estimate of the engineers to maintain the work already done upon this project. It seems to me it is just a waste of the public money to appropriate not even enough to take care of the work which has been already accomplished by the public moneys heretofore expended.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 26, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out lines 1116 and 1117. The gentleman from Washington Territory has told us that if this two-thousand-dollar appropriation is allowed to stand it will be a mere waste of the public money. If that be true, being in favor of economy, I think the entire paragraph should be struck out. If, as the gentleman tells us, this appropriation will serve no useful purpose, then let us save even $2,000 and strike out this paragraph.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] will not prevail. This matter was thoroughly examined by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and it is believed by them that the amount provided for in the bill will do substantial service to that stream. The remarks of the gentleman from Washington Territory were perhaps hardly expected to be taken literally, but only relatively, and I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not prevail.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Skagit, Steilaguamish, Nootsack, Snohomish, and Snoqualmie Rivers, Washington Territory: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1020, strike out "ten thousand" and insert "twenty-two thousand."

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee that these four rivers, the Skagit, Steilaguamish, Nootsack, and Snohomish, represent 250 miles of navigable water, penetrating a portion of the Territory which is entirely destitute of any transportation facilities save those afforded by these streams. They penetrate the heavily wooded portions of the country on Puget Sound; and, as a consequence of every spring freshet, they are filled and choked up with the snags which the floods bring down. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is due to the people in Washington Territory, who are wholly dependent upon these rivers for the transportation of their products to market, that they should be fairly treated in connection with this appropriation. I find that the amount expended on these rivers up to June 30, 1885, is $30,212.33. For the removal of snags, &c., the engineers estimate that $22,000 will be sufficient; they ask for that amount. And on behalf of the people, who, as I say, have no railroad facilities, and who live in a section of the country where railroad building is totally impracticable, I feel that I would come short of my duty did I not draw the attention of this committee to the facts of the case and ask the favorable consideration of this amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a proviso, that at least $1,000 of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in straightening out the names of said rivers. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say that upon these rivers the estimate of the engineers is $20,000, the $2,000 which makes up the $22,000 being the annual reserve for replacement of plant at the end of ten years. Upon that estimate of $20,000 the committee has recommended an appropriation of one-half, which is not true of more than ten per cent. of the rivers embraced in this bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a merely verbal amendment, which is to strike out in line 1018 the word "Steilaquamish" and insert "Steilaguamish."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, $500,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 1022, by striking out the word "five" and inserting "eight;" so as to make the appropriation $800,000.

I offer this amendment not in a spirit of opposition to the river and harbor bill. I have nothing to say as to the adverse criticisms made upon some of the appropriations therein contained. I presume that, coming from the committee, they have been fully considered and are deemed wise. I understand, sir, the rule adopted by that committee to have been to give generally 50 per cent. of the estimate made by the engineer in charge of the work. If, sir, perchance the engineer in charge of a great work came down in his estimate to the last dollar that was absolutely necessary to carry on the needed improvement, that estimate has been cut down 50 per cent., while the engineer who had made an extravagant estimate, possibly upon a less important improvement, received the same percentage.

I do not agree with that much of the policy, if such was the policy of the committee. I simply state it as what I have gathered from the explanations made upon this floor. It does seem that the committee should have informed itself both as to reasonableness of the estimate and the importance of the work. Important and much-needed improvements should not suffer that undeserving enterprises might be provided for.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will correct the gentleman upon that point. The policy of the committee was guided by looking at the annual expenditures for a number of years back.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I made the remark without intending any unjust criticisms of the action of the committee or to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of this bill. The explanation of the gentleman from West Virginia does not help the matter. I have been and am for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. I know that water transportation is absolutely necessary for the protection of the agricultural interest of the great West in which I live. I have gone with the men who have attended the river and harbor conventions to give expressions to the wishes of the people living in great agricultural regions of the Northwest. I know that they feel a deep interest in this bill, whatever Representatives on this floor may do or say to the contrary.

Yet I submit that there is not a gentleman upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors who will say, as an original proposition, that $1,000,000, the amount asked by Major Sutor for the improvement of the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, a distance of 803 miles, is one cent more than the necessities of the case and the importance of the improvement demand. It is a question, sir, whether we are to dump in a few hundred thousand dollars this year and let the spring freshets of next year wash away 25 or 50 per cent. of the work, or whether this great undertaking which is designed to relieve and benefit the great agricultural interests of the States of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska, and the vast, fertile Territory of Dakota shall go on, or whether an appropriation shall be made that will enable the engineer to carry out at least in part the plan he has devised.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARDY was recognized and yielded to Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Sir, the Missouri River from its mouth to Fort Benton, a distance of 2,519 miles, receives under the provisions of this bill only the sum of $610,000. It receives $500,000 for its improvement from its mouth to Sioux City, a distance of 803 miles; it receives $80,000 from Sioux City to Fort Benton, a distance of 1,716 miles; and $30,000 for removing snags 2,519 miles of navigable water, the second, I might say the first river on this continent, draining the great bread-producing and meat-raising sections of these United States.

When we say this sum is inadequate it is admitted, but we are assured that we receive 50 per cent. of the engineer's estimate. Unfortunately for us, the engineer in charge of the work on the Missouri River did not double his estimate. If he had, then, under the rule of the committee, we should have received $1,220,000 instead of $610,000.

The bill is liberal in its appropriations to improve the Lower Mississippi. I do not object to the millions which are set aside for that great enterprise. We of the Missouri Valley are interested in its improvement, but I ask the members of this House to stop and think where you are to get the commerce that is to float the Lower Mississippi, unless it comes from the great and fertile Missouri Valley, from Fort Benton to where the Missouri empties into and becomes part of the Mississippi River—the home of the "breadwinners" of the continent. They are entitled to more consideration than they have received from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. They are now at the mercy of the railroads.

They are industrious; the soil they cultivate is fertile, the harvest abundant, but the rate of freight charged in conveying their products to the consumer is ruinous. Their demands have never received proper attention to secure the reduction of freight rates; thus lessening the burdens of the farmers of the Northwest. Up to the last few years the appropriations were dumped at the doors of members of Congress, looking rather to securing votes than the navigation of the river.

Is there a member upon this floor that will claim that the amount I ask is unreasonable? The appropriation is asked in the interest of these tillers of the soil, the producers—yes, sir, and the consumers. In 1885 the average price of corn in New York was 57 cents; the corn produced in Nebraska brought an average price throughout the State of 19 cents per bushel to the men by whose labor and industry it had been sown, cultivated, garnered, and marketed. Thus the farmer in Nebraska sees two-thirds of the product of his labor go to the railroads and middlemen, while he gets one-third. Is it not the plain duty of Congress to do all in its power by liberal appropriations to open our great rivers, make them navigable for boats and barges, and thus make nature's highways control and regulate the artificial?

In September last a thousand delegates, representing over thirteen million of our people, assembled in Saint Paul and voiced the sentiments of the States and Territories tributary to the Missouri and Upper Mississippi. This convention was supplemented by one composed of some five hundred delegates from the Missouri Valley in December last at Kansas City. It is no reflection upon the members of this House to say that the gentlemen comprising those conventions in point of intelligence, honesty, and patriotism would not suffer by comparison with the distinguished gentlemen who compose the River and Harbor Committee.

These conventions, speaking for the men who create the wealth of the great Northwest, the men who pay the taxes, declared that the people demanded the immediate and permanent improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River upon a general and systematic plan to prepare it for steamers and barges to the end that the costs of transportation be reduced to the minimum. They further demanded appropriations for this work commensurate with the wealth and growth of the great country tributary thereto, its remoteness from Eastern markets, and the fitness of the river for great commerce. They spoke the will of the people, our masters, whose substance is being eaten up by exorbitant charges for transporting their grain to the marts of trade.

It has been stated during the debate in this bill that five hundred thousand workingmen demand liberal appropriations for our internal improvements. Yes, sir; and the merchant, the mechanic, the husbandman, the producer and the consumer, East and West, North and South, demand that these appropriations be liberal and for the benefit of the great rivers, rather than frittered away upon hundreds of unimportant streams. A liberal appropriation for the Missouri is demanded by the commercial and agricultural interests of the States of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska, and the Territories upon its banks. The prosperity of the Northwest, justice as well as an enlightened policy, demand that the waters be utilized for the purpose of commerce.

I am aware, sir, that until within the last four years the appropriations for the improvement of the Missouri have been made on a wrong theory. It was the practice to parcel the appropriation out, $10,000 here, $20,000 there, to the end that each member of Congress might have his share expended in his district. The result, as might be expected, was that but little was accomplished. The means were inadequate at nearly every point. The improvements were not made with reference to a systematic and comprehensive plan of improvement of the river. The last appropriation was in bulk. The expenditures under the direction of Major Suter have been made as part of a system of the uniform improvement of the river. That system should be carried forward. The men of the Northwest demand protection for the agricultural interests of the country. I say to you gentlemen from the East, who ask protection for your manufacturing interests, you can not afford to ignore their demands.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, I thank the gentleman from Kansas for his courtesy.

You gentlemen from the East demanded protection for your manufactures; many of the Representatives from purely agricultural States in the Northwest, believing in protecting the industries of this country, have acted and voted with you in the past. We must have the articles that you manufacture; you must have our meat and breadstuffs. The price of our grain and meat at the seaboard, less the cost of transportation and commissions, is the amount we receive. The cost of your manufactured article at the manufactory plus the freight and profit is what we must pay for it.

The price of our products is regulated by what they are worth in Europe. That which you manufacture and sell us is not thus regulated. There is a protective tariff for your benefit. We demand protection for the agricultural interest, for the pioneers of the great Northwest, the men who have gone out into the wilderness and made it to bud and blossom as the rose by the sweat of their brows. The nearer the producer and consumer are to each other the better it is for each. By cheapening transportation you lessen the distance between them.

It is suggested that the competing lines of railroad do all this; why therefore ask these large expenditures upon the rivers? Yes, we have many lines of railroads in the Missouri Valley, but to a large extent they have ceased to be competing. The pooling system has deprived us of healthy competition. The completion of a new line of railroad to a city in the Northwest or Southwest is but to add another road to the pool to share in the receipts; another railroad upon whose stock, real and watered, dividends are to be paid, and that at the expense of the producer.

The only method known among men by which to effectually control and regulate transportation rates, to bring them down to the minimum, is to utilize the rivers that drain our fields—run past our doors to the ocean. The Almighty in his infinite wisdom placed within our reach the means of protection if it is but utilized. The nearer railroads are to navigable waters the lower the rates, and rates increase as the distance between navigable water and the railroads increases. The rates of the Northwestern pool are about 33 per cent. lower than those of the Southwestern pool from Missouri River points. The Northwestern pool is affected by the lake at Duluth. Railing at these corporations on the stump or in the Halls of Congress will not advance or lessen their schedule rates. The defeat of wise and just appropriations for our water ways is to place more money in the coffers of railroads. The Southwestern pool, under whose exorbitant charges the people of the Missouri Valley are groaning, can only be broken by putting the Missouri River in a condition to float our products in barges to the Mississippi. Every dollar of the people's money thus invested will be repaid to them with interest. There is no economy in making an appropriation of $500,000 for this work when $1,000,000 are demanded.

We are told by Major Suter, the engineer in charge of the work on the Missouri, that the last-named sum can be economically and advantageously expended in the next year, and that that amount is necessary. Yet the committee in its wisdom says that but half the required amount shall be appropriated. I question the wisdom of such action. If the improvement is to be made, economy lies in the line of liberal appropriations, that the work may be expedited.

It is a matter of congratulation that at this day there are none to oppose a river and harbor bill on the ground that the Government under the Constitution has not the power to make these internal improvements. But we now have the enemies of these improvements posing as economists—the guardians of the Treasury.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I indorse every word which has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] except the motion to amend by increasing the amount of this appropriation. I am as earnestly in favor of improving the Missouri River, the Mississippi River, and the other rivers which are to benefit the commerce of this country as any other member on this floor, but I do not think we can afford to increase, as my friend from Kansas City proposes, the amount of these appropriations. If we should make the appropriation he proposes, and similar appropriations for other rivers throughout the country, the result would be a river and harbor bill which would amount to not less than from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000. While the amount which the bill proposes to appropriate for the Missouri River is not so large as I would like to see it, while the appropriation for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Ohio is not so large as I would like to see it, yet in both these cases the committee have allowed, as they believe, a fair percentage of the estimate of the engineers, and the appropriations could not well be made larger without resulting in a bill which the House ought not to pass.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make one suggestion. In considering this bill it will be found that the largest percentages are often given where there are the largest estimates. Especially is this true in regard to the Mississippi River. Where the estimate is, say, $5,000,000, even a very small percentage makes a very large amount for that particular stream. I have sometimes thought that this money could be used more advantageously, more beneficially, if we would make smaller percentages on these large estimates and larger percentages on the smaller items; for oftentimes the appropriations are so small that a large part of the appropriation is consumed in getting the plant and beginning the work of improvement. Five hundred thousand dollars is no inconsiderable sum; $500,000 enables a great deal of work to be done.

While, as I have said, I am not opposed to improving the Missouri River, but on the contrary favor it, yet at the same time it is to-day an experiment to a large extent, just as the improvement of the Lower Mississippi is an experiment.

It is a great deal better, it seems to me, to go slower and surer in regard to these matters which are, to some extent, experimental. I hope, therefore, the friends of the Missouri River, as well as the friends of the Mississippi River, will be content with the amount of money which has been appropriated for these rivers, important as they are, without attempting to increase them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in the appropriations in this river and harbor bill some receive only 10 per cent. of the estimates, others 100 per cent., and very many merely 50 per cent., according to the importance of the work and the interest involved. The committee, in dealing with this particular river, has not considered it simply by itself, but as one portion of the great river system of the country; a system embracing not only the Missouri River and the Mississippi, but the Ohio and many others.

As a rule the committee have appropriated 50 per cent. to the Mississippi and the great tributaries of the Mississippi. The Missouri is provided for as a part of our great river system, and gets the same appropriation as the Mississippi, the same as the Ohio.

The appropriation here for the Missouri River is for half a million dollars. It is true that the engineer recommends that a million dollars should be appropriated; and while it is true that amount could be expended, it is also true that this improvement of the Missouri River is in the experimental stage. The committee therefore did not feel justified in making a larger appropriation before it had progressed out of the experimental stage.

The Missouri River is sui generis. It is peculiar. It is most difficult to manage. Why, sir, prior to 1881, and including the appropriation of 1881, five bills appropriating money for this river were passed, aggregating an amount of $861,000, and the result achieved by that large amount of expenditure so far has been most unsatisfactory.

Yet while that is true, while it has been unsatisfactory, while it has been experimental, at the instance and request of the Missouri delegation, in the first session of the last Congress, this system was changed, and the Mississippi River Commission was established and a new system was entered upon. It is a new system, and although to a limited extent successful, it has not been sufficiently so to inspire the utmost confidence, such as to require a larger appropriation for the Missouri River than for any other river.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. PETERS. I move to strike out the last word. I know, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the Missouri River is different from all the others in the Union; that it is not a stream easily navigated; that its channel is a treacherous one, changeable almost every day. But, as the gentleman who has just preceded me has said that the large expenditure of money which has been made has not brought about satisfactory results, for the sake of argument I will concede all of it—all that he has said; and what is the answer? It is that the Missouri River has not had a fair chance in the race entered into by all these streams in connection with the river and harbor bills. The Mississippi River, as my friend behind me suggests, always gets there first, and the Missouri River comes in for what is left. [Laughter.]

The fact is that most of the appropriations made for the Missouri River heretofore have been expended at different points, not for the purpose of improving the channel of the river, but for the purpose of making landings at certain points and for preserving the banks at certain points.

As my friend has well stated, this is a navigable stream for over 2,500 miles. It is not to be compared with any other river. Its needs have not received proper attention at the hands of Congress. That river of 2,500 miles of navigation is capable of bearing on its bosom a commerce greater than any other section.

I know it is said that the navigation of this river is carried on only by a very few boats; but that is no answer to the query why a greater amount of money should not be appropriated? The very reason why so few boats do navigate the river is simply because so little attention has been paid to improving its channel and making its navigation satisfactory at all stages of water.

It is utterly absurd and useless to divide small sums of money, to scatter it along over this great stretch of country 2,500 miles in length, and hope to accomplish any good results. What is necessary to do is to take hold of it with determination and make it a river which can float upon its broad bosom the commerce of this country; and then you will indeed make it a river which will be second to no other in the Union. There is every facility for doing it; the water is there; the country is along its banks; the grain is produced throughout the whole region watered by it, and all that is needed is the money to protect and improve the channel of the stream so that the commerce raised along its banks may find its way down to the Mississippi River.

Not one dollar less should be used for the improvement than that asked by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GLOVER. I move to strike out the last letter. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], who introduces a comparison between the amount of money appropriated by this committee for the improvement of the Missouri River and the amount appropriated for the Mississippi River, that he has not examined with care the sums recommended by the committee so far as the Mississippi River is concerned.

The improvement of that river is divided into three great sections or reaches, the first section extending from below Cairo to the Head of the Passes; the second, that reach of the river between the Ohio and the Illinois Rivers, and the third, the reach between one of these rivers and the headwaters. So far as the first reach is concerned, the amount appropriated is less than 50 per cent. of the estimates of the engineers, which estimates are the initial point for making the appropriation. So far as that portion between the Ohio and the Illinois Rivers is concerned, it is not more than the amount appropriated for the Missouri River between its mouth and Sioux City; and so far as the upper reach of the Mississippi River is concerned, it is very much less than 50 per cent. of the estimates of the engineers or the sum recommended. Therefore, that portion of the Missouri River between its mouth and Sioux City, in regard to which the amendment is offered, has fared as well as that portion of the Mississippi River, and much better than two-thirds of that great stream, the Father of Waters.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding, after the word "dollars," "which sum shall be expended in protecting the banks of said river from washing and erosion, and confine the same in its natural direction and channel."

Mr. HALE. I fully indorse all that has been said by my colleague from the Kansas City district in regard to the importance and necessity of improving this great highway of commerce. He says the Missouri is the second river of this country. The Missouri is, in fact, the first great river of the North American continent. It drains a larger and more fertile territory than any two rivers on the North American continent. It now drains the waters of four or five of the greatest of our States, and in the lifetime of this generation it will drain the waters of a dozen of the greatest and most populous States of the American Union.

The region of country watered by this river is the great granary of the North and Northwest. It affords wheat, corn, cotton, and stock. It has been said, and justly no doubt, that the money heretofore appropriated to the improvement of this river was doled out in small and insignificant sums which did little good. That is true. It is also true, sir, that in the expenditure of this money the ideas and views of scientific engineers have controlled to the exclusion of common sense and experience.

It has been my good fortune, Mr. Chairman, to live on or near the banks of that river for something less than a hundred years, and I think I know something about it. I think I know something also of the character of the improvements carried on by this river commission, and how the money has been expended. I have viewed it for the last five or ten years critically, and in my judgment a large portion of the money, as has been stated, appropriated by Congress for the improvement of that stream has been frittered and thrown away. There is but one controlling idea in improving the Missouri River; that is, the river banks should be protected from washing and from erosion, as stated in this amendment, and confined within its natural channel and outlet. When this is done, nature will do the balance. Confine the river to its natural channel, protect the banks from washing and erosion, and it becomes the great river of this continent. It becomes the great highway for commerce. But if this money is expended as it has been heretofore, it is throwing away the people's money to no purpose; it is expended on experiments and thrown away to a few favorites.

If the bill is to secure the support of those members of this House who represent that great Missouri Valley it must be in such shape and appropriated in such amounts as will in their judgment do justice to that section of this great country. Without that, sir, we can not afford to vote for this bill. We have creeks and little inlets and swamps and sloughs in the East and West and North and South appropriated for; we have millions appropriated for them and thrown away in private interests. Yet here we have the greatest river in the country, greater than the Mississippi, more entitled to appropriations, receiving but $500,000. What is the amount for the Mississippi river? I have not figured it up, but I presume it is in the neighborhood of three or four millions of dollars—eight times the amount appropriated to the Missouri River. This is not fair. It is not well proportioned. We can not afford to support the bill in this shape. Give us a reasonable amount in proportion to our territory, our wants, our demands, and require this commission to use it in such a manner as will do us some good, and then perhaps we can afford to support the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. In considering this bill it is well for its friends to remember that such a bill has to be prepared as will not only stand the test of consideration by this House, but as will pass the inspection of the President, who has a habit of vetoing such bills sometimes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from West Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that the idea the committee had in their mind when they reduced our appropriations from $800,000, as it was two years ago, to $500,000?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It has been claimed here by the friends of the Missouri River that this appropriation should be made so as to enable work to be carried along from the mouth of the river to Sioux City, and that because the appropriation was not sufficient to carry the work along the whole line therefore they must oppose it. Gentlemen ought to remember that this Congress has at three or four of its sessions by deliberate votes declared that all these schemes for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers were but experiments, and that in relation to the Mississippi River they refused to make any general appropriations, but confined every dollar that was appropriated to be expended at two solitary points, so that tests could be made.

The friends of the Missouri River were not satisfied with the condition of affairs under the engineers, and at the last session of this House they asked the River and Harbor Committee to appoint a commission similar to the commission having charge of the Mississippi River improvement, and asked that that stream might be improved in the same manner the Mississippi River was.

The River and Harbor Committee reported, and the House, desiring to do justice to those gentlemen, passed a bill providing for a Missouri River Commission. That commission has been appointed. The two rivers have been put exactly on the same footing. The Missouri River Commission has made its report to this House and the River and Harbor Committee acted upon the report. That report only asked for about a million dollars or some small amount above it. And they only asked for it with the same understanding that the Mississippi River Commission asked for it. They only asked for it with the same understanding that Congress had heretofore had in acting upon this matter—that it should be expended upon experimental work on one or two reaches so as to see whether the money expended could be profitably expended or not.

I want to know if this House is prepared to go into the heroic struggle of undertaking to treat this river from its mouth to its source in a way that has never been tested in this country and in a manner that no human being could say would be profitable or permanent?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say the appropriations in this bill for the Mississippi River are confined to the recommendations of the commission—to the two reaches?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. In this bill?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; with but two single exceptions, and only small amounts were given in those two cases; the whole bulk of the appropriation for the Mississippi River is confined by the bill to those two points.

A MEMBER. What are those points?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Plum Point reach and Providence reach. And for the balance of the Mississippi River from there to its mouth we directly refuse to give a single cent, because the judgment of both Houses of Congress had by repeated acts declared it was only an experiment, and that the money should not be appropriated or until the plan had been tested.

The gentlemen who complain here of the treatment of the Mississippi River must do it in utter ignorance of the action of the committee on these streams. I do not believe that you intend to misrepresent the facts. But when you remember that the scales of justice were held with exact equipoise between all these waters, and that you have got every dollar that was given to any other stream of this character and the same kind, how is it that you can in the face of these facts charge the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with injustice and with partiality in its recommendations?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask if I understood him correctly when I understood him to say that the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River below the Ohio was confined to the Lake Providence and Plum Point reaches?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. To Plum Point reach and Lake Providence reach, with the exception of two points where a small amount is allowed to be expended for purposes of preservation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully ask a vote on the pending amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected—ayes 35, noes 62.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to speak on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to strike out the last five words. Mr. Chairman, there are two modes, by either of which a river and harbor bill can be constructed. One is to take the estimates of engineers, formulate and make a scale, and make a scaled appropriation accordingly. That basis evidently applies only to such of the streams of the country as estimates have been made for, and we have seen repeatedly in this bill that there is no uniform scale observed. The engineers' estimates are scaled at any point from 15 per cent. up. The other mode is to look at the character of the stream, at its extent, at its relations to the States upon its banks, at its drainage, at the agricultural capacity of the country, to estimate its magnitude, and then make an appropriation for its development based upon its importance as a channel of interstate commerce.

The theory is that the river and harbor bill is constructed upon that basis, and it is upon that basis that you seek to go before the country with it. Now, here is the case of the largest river upon the continent, running through the midst of the great grain region of the continent, and for that river there is appropriated $500,000; whereas, upon the basis of commerce, upon the basis of the volume and capacity of the river, if the rivers in the State of Illinois were to be taken as a standard, this appropriation would be at least five times as large as it is. Therefore I was surprised that my friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] some time since objected to this appropriation lest the aggregate of the bill should exceed $15,000,000.

That may be a question for the committee, but it seems to me that the question for the House to determine is not what the estimate of an engineer may be, not what the aggregate of the bill may be, but what the relative importance of these different streams and harbors is to the great question of interstate commerce, when there is to be appropriated, I think, $175,000 for correcting the channel at Saint Louis—I may overstate the appropriation, but that is my recollection.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman is in error. There is no specific appropriation whatever for Saint Louis.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of course I accept my friend's statement. There is, however, an appropriation for Saint Louis. But my point is that while you have in this bill some little tadpole stream improved to float down logs, or some harbor improved where there is not commerce enough to maintain a wharf, when you see appropriations of that character and then come to a river like this and see an appropriation of half a million dollars for the improvement of this vast stream, a stream with so grand a future in the commerce of this country——

Mr. GLOVER. I would like the gentleman, for the benefit of the House, to name one of the harbors included in this bill and coming under the description he has just given.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I have not time. There are a great many of them.

Mr. GLOVER. There are none.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There would be no trouble in naming them. Now I submit to this House this proposition, that if it be simply fair to appropriate three and three-quarter millions for the Mississippi River, it is undoubtedly fair to appropriate a quarter of a million of dollars more for the improvement of the Missouri, in view of the relief which that great water way is to give in the future to the interior commerce of the United States, and I trust that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that our friends from Missouri will not press this amendment. The committee has fully recognized the commercial importance of the Missouri River and has dealt with it with a most liberal hand. We have done all that we can within the limits of this bill for that great river, and I appeal to gentlemen as friends of this improvement not to press this amendment. Other rivers are upon the same footing in the bill, and if this amendment should pass they could come in here with equal, if not with greater, propriety and demand a like increase, and the result would be that the aggregate appropriations in this bill would be swelled to such an extent as to prevent its passage by this House or this Congress. I hope, therefore, in the interest of the passage of this bill that no friend of the measure will vote for this amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 40, noes 70.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. No quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 105.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I will not insist further on the point that no quorum has voted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOCKERY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 1021 to 1023, inclusive, and insert:

"Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, $620,000; and of said amount the sum of $40,000 shall be expended in the continuation of improvement at or near Kansas City, Mo.; and the amount of $40,000 shall be expended in the protection of the river banks at or near Fort Leavenworth; and the amount of $40,000 shall be expended in continuation of the work at Saint Joseph, Mo."

Mr. DOCKERY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I presume it is unnecessary for me to make any remarks upon that part of the pending amendment which proposes an increase of this appropriation, for I take it that question has been determined by the vote on the previous amendment.

As to the specific amounts asked for in the amendment I have this to say: If the main object of these appropriations were to protect particular localities, to check the devastation suffered by private or corporate property, there would be some merit in that part of the amendment. But if the primary object, Mr. Chairman, be to deepen the channel of this river, so important as it has been described, and thus afford enlarged and cheaper facilities for freight transportation and the general development of the country, then there is no merit in the amendment.

The sort of improvement proposed in this amendment for that river has been tried. As I stated when last on the floor, $861,000 appropriated in five different bills was distributed to thirteen localities on this river, the amounts received by each ranging from $10,000 to $80,000. No good results followed those expenditures. These localities were widely separated, so that the several improvements had no connection. To provide for them required separate plants, as well as distinct and expensive administrative staffs. The results, instead of being beneficial, were disastrous; and this is why the Missouri delegation in the last Congress unanimously asked that the Missouri River Commission should be established, in order to concentrate the appropriations for channel improvement and in order that a systematic plan might be adopted for the improvement of the river. Why repeat that sort of an experiment, which has already been disastrously tried? These are the objections to these specific improvements. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. GLOVER. I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last letter. Mr. Chairman, I am loath to allow this question to be disposed of without some reply to the statement made by several members on this floor and just repeated by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], that the Missouri River has fared less generously at the hands of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors than the Mississippi River. I desire again to call attention to the fact that for the Missouri River the engineers recommend an appropriation of only $1,000,000, while for the Mississippi River throughout its total length there was recommended an appropriation of five or six millions.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Seven millions.

Mr. GLOVER. Seven millions, as the gentleman from West Virginia reminds me. Therefore, such comparisons as we have had between the amounts appropriated for these two rivers are utterly misleading. If my colleague from Missouri will ascertain how much has been recommended by the board of engineers for the improvements which he advocates and will compare the estimates with the appropriation, he will find that the amount reported in this bill for that purpose is one-half of the estimates, while the amount which the bill appropriates for the whole Mississippi River from its headwaters to the jetties is less, much less, than one-half the amount recommended by the engineers. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this statement so often repeated will be heard no more after its error has thus been demonstrated.

Mr. MORRILL addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The question recurred on Mr. DOCKERY'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move the following amendments——

Mr. HALE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. We have not yet passed away from the paragraph which has been under discussion, and I desire to move to perfect it before we do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa also rises to move an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to add the words "to be expended under direction of the Secretary of War without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission."

Mr. WILLIS. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman it is intended to abolish the Missouri River Commission, but it does not do it. It takes this river from under the commission and leaves them with all their expenditures with nothing to do.

Mr. HEPBURN. The purpose of the amendment is to take this improvement from the Missouri River Commission.

I desire to invite attention of the committee to some considerations that we ought to regard while we are now upon the threshold of investing the commission with the expenditure of these vast sums of money. I want to call attention to the fact that the commission by its own reports has failed to make an estimate of the cost, and that the total expenditure is indefinite. They tell us that under their plan the rate of expenditure will be at least $1,000,000 a year, and should be continued over a series of years; so that in the estimates of the commission many millions of dollars will have to be expended by them, but how many is not stated.

As another evidence of the importance of that work, in the sense of large expenditures, I want to call attention to the immense plant the commission have acquired. While they have been in existence but a little over a year, it required the use of three steamboats, constantly employed from the 12th day of April until about the same time in July, to move their plant from the vicinity of the city of Saint Louis to the city of Kansas City. Three months were employed by three steamboats moving the plant that they had then acquired after an existence of but little over a year. Again, and in connection with the plant, an examination of the Blue Book discloses some useful figures. This book contains a list of the employés and the places where they are employed, and it shows a total of $192,000 out of the $610,000 required to pay their salaries. All those who are named in the Blue Book are above the grade of laborers, and that does not include any one of the four military officers to whom $13,000 or $14,000 are paid. The expense in salaries, therefore, is more than one-third of the entire appropriation provided for in this paragraph of the bill. "A half-penny worth of bread to an infinite deal of sack," it seems to me, and yet gentlemen seem to think it is a most desirable thing.

Mr. Chairman, I make the assertion that there is no commerce on this river comparatively speaking. At the city of Council Bluffs, intermediate between Sioux City and the mouth of the river, ten steamboats have not passed in five years, and if any gentleman desires to rise and contradict that assertion I shall be glad to hear from him and cheerfully yield for that purpose.

Further, if the plan they have adopted accomplishes the purpose, that is, to confine the river within its banks and scour out such a channel as will bear steamboats of 8 feet in draught, I say that there will be such a current created as the steamboats can not stem, for in the report of the commission we find this astonishing fact stated, that one of the boats they had provided for the purpose of aiding in the improvement of the river, in its passage from Bismarck upward in the spring of last year, happening to be caught in the flood, was compelled to send out shorelines and tow itself up, and often was compelled to use the capstan in order to make headway against the extraordinary currents of the river.

Now, that is a statement of the commission itself, and I appeal to them and use their report in opposition to their theories.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK was recognized, and by consent yielded his time to Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HEPBURN. Again, Mr. Chairman, this Missouri River I have known in many places where in certain seasons of the year it is only a few rods in width, while, on the other hand, at other times I have seen it stretch out over 5 miles in width, a roaring, raging torrent, extending from bluff to bluff, overwhelming the whole country; and yet these gentlemen propose with an appropriation of $601,000 a year to make this a navigable river and control this raging torrent within limits.

The plan adopted by the commission is to commence at the city of Kansas City and work downward by contracting the channel and by revetting the banks. Now, remember that the fall of the Missouri River from Sioux City to its mouth is 1.01 feet per mile, while for the Mississippi River for the same distance above Cairo it is .51 of a foot to the mile. The Missouri River, therefore, has nearly twice the fall of the Mississippi River and nearly twice the rapidity of current.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri who offered the last amendment has exhibited the "cat in the meal." He says that the amendment provides for the expenditure of $40,000 at each of three places. Now the only possible use of this $500,000 is to improve the river at certain points where it is making encroachments upon valuable property. Much can be done in the way of saving valuable property with such an appropriation. The river runs through an alluvial bed from 5 to 20 miles in width through the most friable soil to be found on the globe. It melts—great masses of it—under the influences of this river in a few hours of time.

I have known the Missouri River to change its bed to a distance of 8 miles in a single night. The city of Hamburg, in Southwest Iowa, at one time stood upon the banks of the river. It is now 8 miles from the river. The town of Saint Mary, in Mills County, Iowa, was, within my recollection, 2 miles east from the banks of the Missouri River. The point where it stood is now more than 3 miles in the State of Nebraska.

There is no permanency of this river; it wanders and meanders through its broad valley just as it pleases, and the only advantage——

Mr. WILLIS. I would suggest to the gentleman that as that river is moving so rapidly in the direction of Iowa he will regret his speech in a year or two from now.

Mr. HEPBURN. It may be. If I was merely looking to the permanency of a particular location perhaps I might; but as I am called to vote on a river and harbor bill involving great constitutional questions, which lie very near to my heart, as they do the heart of the gentleman from Kentucky, I must act a little differently.

I do not wonder that the gentleman from Missouri who has offered the first amendment to this bill is zealous in favor of the paragraph and of the amendment. Under the plan of the commission, as I have before said, they begin their work of improvement at Kansas City. They have $500,000, which they will expend undoubtedly this fall at Kansas City. The spring freshet and ice of next spring will carry away all traces of their work. The appropriation of next year, $500,000, will be expended at Kansas City. And so it will go on year after year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine, obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HEPBURN. Year after year these expenditures will be made at the city of Kansas City; a very desirable thing. A series of years the gentlemen who are in charge of the work say will be required.

Further, Mr. Chairman, although we have two reports from the commission, they refuse absolutely, although they trench upon that question, to make even an estimate of the vaguest character of the cost, and yet they tell us in both of these reports that all of their plans are simply experimental in their character. They give no assurance that they will succeed. The only thing they say with reference to certainty of success or amount of expenditure is that they do not believe that the expenditures will be "enormous;" that is the word they use. They do not believe they will be "enormous," and they lay stress upon that word.

Now, if any gentleman can tell how many millions of money or how many scores of millions are contained within those limits, I would be glad if they would do it. It has been stated here upon this floor by gentlemen authorized to speak that the Mississippi River improvement would cost $150,000,000 at least. The Missouri River improvement, if it is to be made navigable, if the purposes of the commission are to be accomplished, will require five times that amount in my humble judgment. Five times the difficulties of current, the difficulties with regard to friable soil, the entire absence of clay formations or of rock for a thousand miles along the river—all these make it almost absolutely certain that the cost of improving the Missouri River will be infinitely greater than that of improving the Mississippi.

Then why are you improving it? There is no commerce upon it except perhaps a little very near its mouth and a little above Bismarck. Between Bismarck and the mouth of the river, or, let us say, within 100 miles of the mouth of the river, a stretch of more than a thousand miles, there is absolutely no commerce at all. And yet it is navigation that we are after; it is improving the great water ways of the country; it is to effect the great question of cheap transportation; it is in the interest of the farmer that gentlemen are voting for here! When has any one of the zealous delegation from Missouri known of a single cargo of corn being transported upon that river? They talk about the cattle and the hogs that are to be shipped to market. When have they known of a drove of cattle or of hogs going to market by the Missouri River?

Mr. PETERS. They may have gone upon the ice. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. As my friend from Kansas suggests, they may have gone upon the ice, but otherwise such a thing is unknown.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the policy of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in regard to the improvement of these great water ways to be like that of the Irishman in regard to getting on his boots—he said he would have to wear them a week or two before he could get them on. [Laughter.] The gentleman's idea seems to be that we must get the commerce first and improve the facilities for commerce afterward.

Mr. HEPBURN. But you have not got any commerce there. The Irishman had feet, so in his case there was an apparent necessity for boots. [Laughter.] But there is no commerce here, and therefore no apparent necessity for improving the means of commerce.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand that the commerce is there if you will only make a place for it to go.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, sir, there is a railroad on each side of that river to-day from Sioux City to its mouth.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I commend to gentlemen who are attacking the work of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the situation which has developed this afternoon between the various systems of opposition. I commend to Representatives on this floor from the State of Missouri the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who tells us that the Missouri River is flanked on each side by a railroad; and perhaps, after all, those two railroads are the milk in this cocoanut. I commend that speech to those Representatives, in order that they may defend themselves on this floor for the appeal which they made a short time ago to take $800,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and appropriate it for the improvement of that miserable creek. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. If the gentleman will give way to me I will defend myself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is abundantly able to defend himself. There is no question about that. But, Mr. Chairman, the opposition to the report of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has taken a singular form this afternoon. The first outbreak was to the effect that the committee had been guilty of a great outrage against this river in concluding to appropriate only half a million dollars instead of eight hundred thousand, and the unanimity of that cry was absolutely charming. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] joined in, and all the opponents of the bill voted with singular unanimity to increase that appropriation $300,000. They did not quite succeed. Thereupon we had a reproduction of the old darkey's comment upon the rabbit that got away—that it was "a miserable poor rabbit anyhow." [Laughter.] The point of it all is, the logic of it all is, the moral of it all is, that the assailants of this bill, and the combination, if I may be allowed the word, the gentle, the pleasant, the harmonious circle here that are assailing this committee, have concluded at last that if this river is not worth $800,000 this year it is not worth a dam even for slackwater purposes anywhere along the line. [Laughter.]

I call upon the gentlemen from Missouri to say whether or not it is a fraud upon the Treasury of the United States to improve the stream which has been described here—a stream that has no commerce, that dries up in summer, that is such a flood in winter that you can not run against the current (I never heard of such a river as that, except the Niagara), a stream that is absolutely uncontrollable, that spreads out all over the country—I call upon the gentlemen from Missouri to explain how it is that they come in here and denounce the Committee on Rivers and Harbors because we are not willing to squander $800,000 upon a stream like that. The provision in the bill which gives to the Missouri River Commission the expenditure of the money is certainly commendable, when gentlemen who claim to know all about the subject tell such different stories about that river. Obviously, under the circumstances, there ought to be some board of arbitration to stand between the distinguished gentleman from Kansas City [Mr. WARNER] and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and say what shall be done with the $500,000 which this bill recommends shall be appropriated for the improvement of the Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been offered.

Mr. MORRILL obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The gentleman from Kansas has placed me under additional obligations.

Sir, it was not my purpose to make any extended remarks, nor have I thought it necessary to cite tables of figures showing the difference between the rates by rail and water. I was reluctant to obtrude myself upon the House by offering even an amendment. Yet it was my duty to the people of the Missouri Valley, of whom my constituents form a part, that impelled me. The offering of this amendment, meritorious as it must be admitted by all, is taken by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as an attack on the bill, an assault upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I am unconscious of having invaded the sacred circle which the gentleman seems to have drawn around that committee. If it is assailing the dignity, the integrity, the intelligence of the honorable gentleman from Ohio and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors because forsooth I have the temerity to ask that this great national highway—the Missouri River—should receive $800,000 this year instead of $500,000, then I am guilty. If in an honest attempt to have this House carry out the recommendations of the producers of the Missouri Valley is to offend the dignity of the committee, then in this have I offended.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has found a reason satisfactory to himself at least why I am so zealous in pressing for an increase of this appropriation for the Lower Missouri from $500,000 to $800,000. He says, "One need not wonder that the Kansas City member is so zealous, because the money will be expended in and about Kansas City." Let me say to the gentleman, there is no city on the continent more deserving than the city which I have the honor to represent on this floor, none that will make greater returns for every dollar expended. Sir, the people of the Missouri Valley are proud of the energy and prosperity of that city. Her rapid strides to commercial supremacy are the wonder of the entire country. Yesterday unknown, to-day in volume of financial transactions, as shown in the clearing houses of the country, she stands forth the tenth city in the Union. Her elevators store the grain, her stock-yards handle the live-stock, her packing-houses, second to those of only one other city in the world, Chicago, purchase, slaughter, and ship the hogs and cattle of the Missouri Valley.

She stands in the gateway between the East and the great West. She is one of the principal railroad centers of America, and fully realizes their importance and beneficial influence. Her bankers, her merchants, her people are anxious that the farmer who markets his grain and stock in that city shall share in her prosperity. They know even better than the gentleman from Iowa of the pressing and immediate necessity for the improvement of that interstate highway of commerce, the Missouri River, that the producer may receive larger returns for the fruit of his labor. If, therefore, to press upon Congress with all my energy the justness of the amendment I have offered is to be zealous, then I frankly admit the charge made by the gentleman. It is no sufficient reason to me because the people whom I have the honor to represent upon this floor will be largely benefited by the amendment that, therefore, I should be lukewarm in advocating it. If by any and all honorable efforts and zeal in and out of Congress legislation beneficial to my district and State can be secured, I freely confess that I have not reached that state of sublime disinterestedness, nor do I stand upon that imaginary platform of statesmanship (upon which some gentlemen seem to pose), to permit such legislation to fail because of a want of honest effort and zeal on my part. Nay, more, I am for the people I represent first, and all the energy, all the influence at my command shall be given in their interest. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, if the intimation of my friend from Iowa, for whose abilty and uniform courtesy I have the highest respect, is susceptible of the construction that I am trying to get an appropriation of $800,000 for the improvement of a river upon which there is no commerce, a river that is not and never can be made navigable, that my purpose is not the improvement of the river, that I urge this appropriation for the reason that a part of the appropriation is to be expended in and about the city of Kansas, I say to the gentleman that I am not conscious of being so actuated. It is to be hoped that the gentlemen who are so fiercely opposing any appropriation for the Missouri River can say that their opposition is not prompted by the fact that no part of the money is to be appropriated at their doors.

Every Representative upon this floor from the States of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska is equally interested in the question of cheap transportation, which can only be obtained by making the waters of the Missouri navigable for steamboats and barges. If this is not accomplished they have but themselves to blame. The people of those States gave forth no uncertain sound on this question at Saint Paul last September, and again at Kansas City in the following December. It is strange that any member of this House from either of those great agricultural States should oppose liberal appropriations for the improvement of the Missouri. Nay, there are some who seek by their indifference or open opposition to prevent any appropriation for that river.

It is claimed that the people at the river and harbor conventions at Saint Paul and Kansas City did not know what they were talking about; that the navigation of the Missouri River is an absurdity—the vagary of a disordered intellect.

Sir, the exorbitant rates the producers in the States along the Missouri are compelled to pay to move their crops to market is a reality. What is the remedy? Distinguished engineers as well as steamboat men who have spent their lives upon the Missouri entertain no doubt as to the entire feasibility of improving that river so that its waters will convey with safety fleets of barges laden with the golden grain and other products of its valley out and into the Mississippi, thus securing a reduction of the rates of freight between the farm and the markets to the minimum. The thorough improvement of the great water ways of the country is the true and natural solution of the interstate-commerce question.

The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has seen fit to throw his influence against any attempt to improve the Missouri. He is pleased to brand all talk advocating it "arrant nonsense," and then adds, "doing something for the people of this country is better than filling our mouths with words about them." Most true. But, sir, what do you propose to do for the "breadwinners" of the Missouri Valley? Absolutely nothing. The Missouri River should be in the future, what it was in the past, a great channel of commerce. This the engineers assure us can be done at a cost of $10,000 per mile, adapting it to the shipment of grain in bulk by barges. Yet the gentleman from Maine says this is all "arrant nonsense." The engineers do not know what they are talking about.

For one, I prefer to rest upon the judgment of those who have a knowledge of the Missouri River as to its capabilities rather than the mere unsupported assertions of those who are opposed to its improvements. I prefer to act upon the opinions of its friends, whose only object is to obtain cheap transportation, rather than follow the lead of the open enemies to all improvements on that great river. Its improvement is neither sectional nor local, it is national in its character and effects. Neither partisan bias nor local prejudice should be permitted to govern a member's vote on this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to reply very briefly to the gentleman from Iowa. This Missouri River Commission was created by the act of July, 1884. It has been largely occupied, as the gentleman knows (because he has studied this question), with the preliminary survey and the formation of plans for the improvement of that river. The gentleman is mistaken when he says that no estimate has been made. Major Suter has made an estimate, in which he states that at an expenditure of $10,000 per mile the river can be improved; that between Kansas City and the mouth of the river the improvement will cost between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to read——

Mr. WILLIS. I know what the gentleman would read. He would read from the report of the Missouri River Commission, in which it is stated that they have not yet had time to make an accurate estimate of the full cost of this improvement. But in another communication Major Suter says that it will cost about $10,000 per mile.

Mr. HEPBURN. He once said $8,000, did he not?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not recollect that he did.

But my friend says, "Why improve this river?" The answer is stated in one sentence. There are two great railroads running parallel with this river; and when you improve the river it will regulate and reduce rates on those railroads. Let me read one illustration out of thousands, showing in a nutshell the importance of this improvement. I desire to refer to the statement of W. H. Miller, of Kansas City, before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He says:

> On the Missouri River, in 1878, we employed barges between Saint Louis and Kansas City, and they carried grain at 5½ cents per bushel, while the current rail rate was 13 cents per bushel on wheat and 8 cents on corn. Wherever else water transportation has been employed, and to whatever article it has been applied, like results have followed.
> In 1880 our elevators became full of grain, the rail rate being such as would not admit of its movement. Negotiations were entered into between our grain merchants and barge companies on the Mississippi River, looking to a repetition of the experiments of 1878. The fact came to the knowledge of the railroads, and they immediately anticipated the danger of further employment of water craft on the Missouri with a rate of 8 cents per hundred pounds, 7 to 12 cents less than the current rate, and took the grain away.

This illustrates the necessity for improving this river in order to regulate and control transportation rates on the railroads running parallel with the river. With this brief statement I respectfully ask a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last five words. I make this motion in order to reply to some remarks of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] touching the Missouri River as one of the great water ways of the country. We have had the spectacle here of the gentleman from Iowa ridiculing any attempt to improve the Missouri River because, as he claims, it is not worthy of improvement. That river, in point of navigable water way, is the longest in the universe. The gentleman from Iowa must certainly, on reflection, concede that the Missouri River is one of the water ways of the country meriting improvement. If he persists in his former statement I desire to call his attention to a letter which he himself addressed to the Kansas City water way convention. On the 29th and 30th of December, 1885, a convention was held at Kansas City for the purpose of bringing to the attention of Congress the great needs of the Missouri River in reference to its improvement. Among the gentlemen invited to attend that convention as delegates were all my friends around me from the Western States and Territories, among them the gentleman from Iowa himself. Delegates from the State of Iowa did attend that convention.

The convention, in resolutions which are published in the pamphlet I hold in my hand, demanded of Congress large appropriations for the improvement of the Missouri River and sustained and indorsed the Missouri River Commission. My friend from Iowa, I am sorry to say, did not heed that invitation to attend the convention as a delegate, but he did write a letter, which was read in the convention and which appears in its proceedings. He was very careful in the letter not to commit himself to any great extent, but he did declare in favor of the improvement of the great water ways of the country; and now to-day he seems to believe that the Missouri River is not one of these water ways. Bear in mind that his letter was written to a convention called in the interest solely of the Missouri River.

Here is the letter:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1885.
> H. M. KIRKPATRICK, Esq.,
> Kansas City, Mo.:
>
> SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of December 8 inviting me to attend a Missouri River improvement convention to be held in your city on the 29th instant.
>
> I heartily sympathize with all honest efforts to secure the improvement of the water ways of the country——

Mr. HEPBURN (from his seat). Yes; I stand by that now. All honest efforts.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And yet to-day we have the spectacle of that gentleman declaring virtually upon this floor that the Missouri River, the longest river in America, is not one of the water ways of the country that can be honestly improved.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And the worst of it is that he has proved it, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. He said:

> I heartily sympathize with all honest efforts to secure the improvement of the water ways of the country as one of the means best and most certainly calculated to bring cheap transportation to the people, but my engagements are such that it will be impossible for me to be present on the interesting occasion suggested.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. BLANCHARD.

> Hoping that your convention may be largely attended, and that all its deliberations may be characterized by harmony and judicious conclusions, I have the honor to remain,
>
> Your very obedient servant,
> W. P. HEPBURN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, he then wanted the great water ways of the country improved, "as one of the best means and most certainly calculated to bring cheap transportation to the people," and yet to-day in his remarks he tells the House that the railroads running down on both sides of the Missouri River carry all the produce of that country, and challenges any gentleman here to mention the time when even a boat-load of hogs had been carried down that river. Sir, the Missouri River is a great water way of the country; one of the great continental avenues which we have, and which should be improved to its utmost capacity, to "bring cheap transportation to the people," as the gentleman puts it in his letter. It is the competition of that river with the railroads which holds in check the freight charges on the latter. Let us adequately improve the river and thus enlarge its capacity as a competing line to the railroads.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I hope now the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and that we can have a vote upon this question.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the gentleman from Louisiana has pointed out a case which seems to strike me as a very conspicuous falling from grace. I desire to mention, in that connection, a case which has impressed itself upon my mind as a very conspicuous conversion to the merits of the improvement of the Missouri River.

I am not yet able to say whether it was a conversion like that of Saul of Tarsus, which sprang from genuine humiliation and conviction, through the agency of light upon his mind, or whether it was like that of Julian the apostate, not founded upon sincerity and truth. But it is an incident, and I propose that it shall not pass without notice in this debate, for I saw with my own eyes, and was deeply gratified to see it, the member from Maine [Mr. REED] rise to support the amendment offered to increase the appropriation for the Missouri River. And I say, Mr. Chairman, when I saw him support the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], providing for a specific appropriation of money, a hundred thousand dollars, for specific points upon that river, I felt that there was a conversion at last; but, as I said before, I have not been able as yet to stamp it with the mark of the genuine metal. I desire, however, that it should be noticed; and possibly it shows progress in the direction of the improvement of the Missouri River.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I must say I am charmed to hear the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat. He has undoubtedly read the story of Paul on the way to Damascus, but he does not seem to have read it correctly, for he supposed the light struck his heart, when the sacred history tells him that the light struck his eyes.

But I do not know to what he alludes when he refers to me. It seems to me I have not risen nor given any such vote; but whether I did or not, it is perfectly apparent that no man with his senses would vote this money for the Missouri River after the explanation that has been made of it by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and especially after the utter failure of the other side to sustain or support by any facts anything to controvert it.

Now here is a remarkable spectacle. The gentleman from Iowa comes up here with certain statements of fact, not one of which was met here, and the only attempt which has been presented on the floor of this House is the effort of the gentleman from Louisiana to administer to him a personal rebuke because he said he was in favor of all honest improvements of our water ways. A man who is not in favor of that is a foolish man.

But does that mean that we are all to be in favor of throwing money into every water way that there is? And, if it does not, does that mean that we are opposed to cheapening transportation and opposed to the farmers of this country? What arrant nonsense! How the law of supply and demand does work in this House! There seems to be an enormous demand for talk here about the necessity of giving everybody everything for as nearly nothing as possible, and gentlemen with mouth-filling discourses have been endeavoring to persuade somebody or other, not including themselves, that they are especially patriotic on such occasions. What a folly this always is! Why, an aruspex looking an aruspex in the face could not smile as we must do here when we are making this talk among ourselves.

Let us face these problems squarely; let us deal with them on facts and figures. Facts and figures are better than rhetoric. Facts and figures are better than profession. Doing something for the people of this country is better than filling our mouths with words about them.

Now here is an improvement—an improvement!—which has been characterized by a statement of facts from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. Does the honorable chairman of the committee answer him? Do the other gentlemen answer those facts? Not by a word. We hear beautiful platitudes about cheapening transportation and improving water ways and all that kind of thing, but not a syllable in reply to the facts. Will one of them reply to what I said about the Mississippi River the other day? Not one.

Now let us take these questions squarely, and vote on them, and then show our devotion to the interests of commerce by voting for those parts of the bill that are really in favor of commerce and really in favor of cheapening transportation.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to say a word with regard to an inference that might be drawn from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and was doubtless intended to be drawn from them when he suggested that the fact of two railways running along this proposed improvement was the reason why I opposed it. That was entirely gratuitous. That gentleman might, it seems to me, have performed his whole duty as a Representative in this House or as a member of this committee or as one of the largest beneficiaries of that committee without making any insinuation of that kind. There is no railway in the world that I have any more interest in than any other citizen of the United States. I am not one of those, like the gentleman, always ready to howl against corporations of this kind because in certain circles and among certain men it is popular, because there are votes to be had by that kind of procedure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did you ever hear me howling against corporations?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When?

Mr. HEPBURN. In the same kind of insidious way in which the gentleman makes this charge.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I intended no charge against the gentleman from Iowa, but simply intended to say that the presence of two railroads along the bank of the river may account for the claim that the improvement of the river is not necessary.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not say anything about the gentleman's position. The gentleman is ready to impugn the motives of other people. There is no one on this floor that has impugned the motives of any gentleman that has had aught to do with the preparation of this bill.

And yet there is abundant occasion for an inference of selfishness in the preparation of that bill. There are eleven gentlemen members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who have taken to themselves and their own States nearly one-half of all the appropriations that are made to States. Look at the difference there is to be found in the amounts bestowed upon those States that are represented and the amounts bestowed on those that are not.

Texas has $959,000 in the bill and is represented on the committee. Louisiana has $104,000, besides the large share she gets of the Mississippi River improvement. Louisiana is represented on the committee. Ohio has $403,000. The gentleman who was so ready to impugn the motives of other people represents Ohio on the committee. Illinois has $305,000, and, singular fact, she is represented on the committee. Michigan has $908,000 in the bill, and she is represented on the committee. California has $333,500; represented on the committee. West Virginia, modest West Virginia, has $254,600. My friend represents her on the committee. Kentucky has $527,000; represented so ably by the chairman of the committee. Alabama has over $600,000, every dollar of which will be spent in the State of Alabama; represented on the committee.

So I might go on showing that while there may be no selfishness manifested by this, yet there is the singular coincidence that the States that are most largely remembered are the States that are ably represented on the committee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I desire to read a paper that was indorsed by representative men from Dakota, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, and Nebraska. These gentlemen prepared statistics on this subject to which I propose to call attention for a few moments for the benefit of the committee. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] have made assertions and defied proof as to the importance and value of the improvement of these water ways in regard to their ability to compete with the lines of railway, I will let the people of the great Northwest answer as to these facts. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the great struggle here and throughout this country is to institute some means of controlling the freight traffic on the lines of the railways. I understand very well, and while I make no accusation or charge against any gentleman on this floor, yet I am constrained to say that throughout this country there is a feeling that whenever any question comes up before this committee or before this House affecting the interests of the great monopolies of this country they are at all times defended from certain quarters.

I read from this paper presented at the convention held in September, 1885, of delegates from the States and Territories of the Missouri Valley, as follows:

In 1878, the Mississippi Valley Transportation Company, of Saint Louis, was induced to send a fleet of three barges to Kansas City for a cargo of grain. It came to us empty, and was composed of barges too large for our river. It left our port on the 5th of July, taking away 83,540 bushels of corn. The fleet met with no mishap, except a delay on account of a bar for about eight hours; and its success induced the Babbage Transportation Company to follow with a fleet of three barges better adapted to our river. This fleet came to us three times that season, and each time empty. It took away, July 27, 62,038 bushels of corn; August 12, 62,938 bushels of corn; and August 31, 44,198 bushels of wheat, and met with no accident on any of its trips. It had to abandon the business in August, however, because of low water on the bars.

At the time these barges thus carried from Kansas City to Saint Louis 208,516 bushels of corn and 44,198 bushels of wheat, the rail rate between the two cities was 13 cents per bushel on wheat and 8 cents per bushel on corn. The rate at which the barges carried it was 5½ cents per bushel, including insurance, a saving of 2½ cents per bushel on the corn and 7½ cents per bushel on the wheat, or $8,537.65 on the four shipments. But this is not all; the barges while making such a saving to the owners of the grain, and while running empty one way, made, at the rate charged, a profit of 100 per cent.

Could we successfully employ barges on the Missouri River between Kansas City and Saint Louis alone, so as to realize this saving in the cost of marketing our crops, it would make a vast difference to the people of the Missouri Valley. On the wheat and corn crops of this section for 1879, the latest for which we have exact figures, these savings of 7½ and 2½ cents per bushel, respectively, would have made a total saving for that year alone of $14,042,243—being in one year on two cereals on only the 400 miles between Kansas City and Saint Louis, an actual saving of nearly twice the estimated cost of improving the whole 800 miles from Sioux City to Saint Louis. Could we employ barges on the Missouri River between Kansas City and Sioux City it would make an annual saving equal to that here shown between Kansas City and Saint Louis and would be in addition thereto. Or could we employ barges from Sioux City to Saint Louis to move our crops, the saving in the cost of marketing one crop like that of 1879 would be double that shown above, or four times the estimated cost of improving that much of the river.

From the facts disclosed by the experimental fleet of 1878, and from a knowledge of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, derived from a long experience with them, Captain Lowery, who had charge of the Babbage Company's fleets in 1878, arrived at the conclusion that, with adequate improvement of these rivers, grain can be carried from Kansas City to New Orleans at a freight charge of 7 cents per bushel. It is believed that a corresponding rate from all other Missouri River points, and 3 cents added for the higher costs of ocean freightage to foreign markets from New Orleans than from Atlantic ports, would not exceed 12 cents per bushel, making the grain available for export from New Orleans at the same charge as from Atlantic ports.

The current rail rates for years past from Missouri River points to Atlantic ports has not been less than 21 cents on wheat and 16 cents on corn—a difference of 4 cents on corn and 9 cents on wheat in favor of the river route. The price of grain in the Missouri Valley is the price in foreign markets less the cost of placing it there. The price in foreign markets is fixed by the supply from countries other than our own; hence this saving, if realized, as it may be by the improvement of our rivers, will inure to the producers in the Missouri Valley, and will apply to the entire product of our farms, as well as to that part exported.

The product of the Missouri Valley in the census year 1879, the last for which we have accurate statistics, was 61,116,377 bushels of wheat and 414,349,526 bushels of corn. These crops at 4 and 9 cents respectively give a total sum of $22,074,456, which river transportation would save to the producers of the Missouri Valley on each crop like that of 1879.

We have to consider, however, not alone the benefits that may be secured, but the dangers that may be averted. The high cost of transportation in this country, maintaining as it does the high cost of American grain in foreign markets, and the reduced cost of transportation from grain-producing countries in Asia incident to the opening of the Suez Canal, reducing as it does the cost of grain from those countries delivered in the same market, has so stimulated their product, that they threaten soon to drive American grain from all markets accessible to both, and to so reduce the profit of its production in the Missouri Valley as to depress our agricultural industries and compel the adoption of other products. The contest between American grain and that of other countries for primacy in the world's market is now reduced to a matter of transportation. The advantages are now against us, but the improvement of our water ways will turn this permanently in our favor. These facts now present a dangerous and threatening situation, and the improvement of our river, as a means of promoting cheaper transportation for our grain than railroads can afford, is demanded not merely as a means for securing great benefits, but likewise as a means of averting great disasters. And it is in the interest of not only securing benefits but averting disasters that this appeal to you is made.

The practicability of the improvement of our river is no longer a matter of doubt. The success of the jetties and other improvements on the Mississippi River is well and generally known. Experiments on the Missouri River, both by private and corporate enterprise and by Government appropriations, have demonstrated that this stream also can be easily and cheaply improved.

After careful survey and adequate study of the river, Maj. Charles R. Suter, then engineer of the United States Army and member of the Mississippi River Commission, now president of the Missouri River Commission, reported to Congress in 1881 that an expenditure of $10,000 per mile would secure a permanent channel of 12 feet depth at low water and of sufficient width for purpose of navigation. This sum does not exceed half the cost of a single-track railroad, and will present transportation facilities equal to all the railroads in the valley combined.

With such advantages to gain and such threatened disasters to avert at so small a cost, this committee believes that every resident of the Missouri Valley should cordially unite in efforts to secure the improvement of our river. A united sentiment among the people will secure a united effort by our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and a united effort on their part, as has been demonstrated in other matters, will secure success in obtaining all reasonable appropriations and the early completion of this great and beneficent work.

In order that the people may understand the great interests involved in this matter and be encouraged to aid in securing that united local sentiment these statements are sent to them, and in order that that sentiment may find appropriate and unequivocal expression, they are respectfully invited to send delegates to a Missouri River improvement convention, to be held at Kansas City, at 10 o'clock a. m. Tuesday, December 29, 1885. The governors, Senators and Members of Congress and other distinguished citizens will be specially invited to be present. And in order that the convention may be a large and representative one, the following basis of representation has been agreed upon:

Commercial bodies of 500 members or less	10 delegates.
Commercial bodies, each additional 500 members or less	5 delegates.
Cities, towns, townships, and counties having no commercial organization, of 5,000 population or less	5 delegates.
For each additional 5,000 population	2 delegates.

We take pleasure in stating that the board of trade and people of Kansas City cordially unite with us in this call, and that they will provide all conveniences and requisites for the sessions and success of the convention.

As rapidly as appointed the names of delegates should be reported to H. M. Kirkpatrick, esq., corresponding secretary, Kansas City.

The remoteness of the Missouri Valley from lake and ocean ports increases the importance of the stream and the necessity of its improvement, and we most earnestly invite a general and cordial response to this call.

L. R. BOLTER, President, Logan, Iowa.
W. H. BEADLE, Secretary, Yankton, Dak.
J. D. BARKER, Treasurer, Girard, Kans.
T. B. BULLENE, Kansas City, Mo.
THOMAS A. SCOTT, Wyandotte, Kans.
T. G. MERRILL, Helena, Mont.
E. M. CORRELL, Hebron, Nebr.
JOHN H. KING, Chamberlain, Dak.
H. M. KIRKPATRICK, Kansas City, Mo.
WILLIAM GLENN, Harper, Kans.
A. J. SAWYER, Lincoln, Nebr.
T. C. POWER, Helena, Mont.
J. MILLER, Sac City, Iowa.

Before Mr. BLAND had completed reading the above extracts the hammer fell.

Mr. BLAND asked and obtained leave to complete the extracts in the RECORD as printed above.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope we shall have a vote before the committee rises. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will withdraw his motion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 69.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to insert after the word "dollars," in line 1023, the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 38, noes 70.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that no further debate is desired upon this part of the bill, and with that understanding I ask a vote.

Mr. HEPBURN. My objection to having the vote taken at this time is that the friends of the bill are all present, while many of its opponents are absent.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, Mr. Chairman, if that is the point the gentleman makes, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3370) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburg, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3371) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Illinois River in the State of Illinois, and the Des Moines River in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5673) to authorize the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from Winona, Minn., to the opposite shore, in Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. 6358) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in Montana.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the House of the following titles, requested conferences with the House on the said bills and the amendments thereto, and had appointed Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. VEST as the conferees on the part of the Senate with regard to each of said bills:

A bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River;

A bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.;

A bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cooke County, Texas;

A bill (H. R. 3915) authorizing the Interstate Rapid-Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company to maintain a bridge across Red River;

A bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 135) granting a pension to Mary A. Tibbets;

A bill (S. 214) for the relief of Oscar Eastmond and James W. Atwill;

A bill (S. 364) granting a pension to Nancy Battorff;

A bill (S. 506) for the relief of Emerson Etheridge and William B. Stokes;

A bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot, near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company;

A bill (S. 1805) for the relief of Miss Rosa Wallace;

A bill (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina;

A bill (S. 2224) in aid of the national monument at Plymouth, Mass.; and

A bill (S. 2239) extending the time for the completion of the records of the clerk of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and the transfer of the same to the Department of State.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARNOT: Petition, letters, and papers to accompany House bill 8294, for the relief of R. R. R. Dumars—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SPOONER: Testimony relating to pension claim of Waitie F. Harris, House bill 8258—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STORM: Memorial of Grange No. 52, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pennsylvania, asking for legislation for the suppression of the manufacture and sale of all imitations of dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of the same, against placing raw material on the free-list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TURNER: Petition of George Kargler, county school commissioner, and others, citizens of Terrell County, Georgia, for aid to common schools—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. VAN EATON: Petition of B. M. Howell, to accompany bill 8193—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. VAN SCHAICK: Memorials of Milwaukee Assembly, No. 4517, with 152 members, and No. 2438, with 418 members, asking for the repeal of immigration treaties with China—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of M. R. Bivan and others, and of John Bumb and others, asking for the repeal of immigration treaties with China—to the same committee.

By Mr. A. C. WHITE: Memorial of Granges Nos. 503, 575, and 623, of Pennsylvania, in favor of suppressing the manufacture and sale of imitation butter—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of the same and of A. A. Sloan and others, against the passage of the proposed tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Of H. D. Rugg and others, and of George H. Wheelock and others, of Massachusetts.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. DUNHAM: Of Rev. M. M. Parkhurst and 30 others, citizens of Chicago, Ill., and of Mrs. J. C. S. Miller, president North Chicago Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and 29 other ladies of the same city.

By Mr. SCOTT: Of citizens of Warren County, Pennsylvania.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 29, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots," approved April 17, 1874;

A bill (H. R. 1500) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district;

A bill (H. R. 2646) granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 4063) to authorize the improvement of the water-power in the Mississippi River at Little Falls, Minn.

The bill (H. R. 4616) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company is asking Congress for the passage of an act providing for the cancellation of its present bonded indebtedness and the obligations to the Government, consisting of $29,000,000 of thirty years' 7 per cent. bonds now nearly due, which will aggregate the sum of about $90,000,000, which, together with the other obligations made by the so-called Thurman act, would amount to more than $100,000,000 in all; and

Whereas the said Union Pacific Railroad Company seeks by such legislation to substitute in lieu of its obligations to the Government 3 per cent. bonds to mature in eighty years from the date of their issue; and

Whereas this proposition does violence to all business principles; and

Whereas the management of said Union Pacific Railroad Company has been wasteful and extravagant, having misappropriated its earnings and proceeds from the sale of its domain granted to it by the General Government to aid in its construction; and

Whereas such misappropriation of its proceeds and mismanagement is the cause of its present impoverished condition; and

Whereas it has unceasingly discriminated against Iowa and Iowa interests, crushing out enterprises of vital consequence to the State and its growth and material prosperity, together with other enterprises along the line of its road, varied in their character, in other States and Territories, thus giving continued evidences of its hostility to the interests of the people who must ultimately bear these enormous burdens; and

Whereas by its past record of misappropriation and wastefulness of its earnings and revenues, giving no assurance by this record that its credit would be improved in the end, or that the Government or the people would in any measure be relieved of other additional burdens thus sought to be imposed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That we do solemnly protest against the enactment of this law, and that our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use all honorable means in their power to prevent the passage of such law.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward duly certified copies of the foregoing preambles and concurrent resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original concurrent resolution as adopted by the Twenty-first General Assembly of Iowa, as the same appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Des Moines, the capital, this 6th day of April, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth, of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SEWELL presented memorials of Granges No. 8 and No. 36, Patrons of Husbandry, in New Jersey, remonstrating against the admission free of duty of all agricultural raw materials; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Grange No. 60, Patrons of Husbandry, in New Jersey, praying for the suppression of the manufacture and sale of imitation dairy products; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of a large number of citizens of Kansas, praying that what are known as the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory may be opened to homestead settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Boston (Mass.) Monthly Meeting of Friends, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL presented twenty-six petitions of citizens of Florida, praying for an extension of the time for the construction of the line of road from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of citizens of Washington, D. C., residing in the vicinity of Iowa Circle, praying for the removal of the Bartholdi fountain from the Botanical Garden to that circle; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1942) for the relief of Hiatt & Co., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1375) for the relief of E. C. Chirouse, late United States Indian agent; and

A bill (S. 1376) for the relief of John F. Malo.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1800) to secure to the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands, under the act of March 3, 1883; and

A bill (S. 2060) to authorize the purchase of a tract of land near Salem, Oreg., for the use of the Indian training-school.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2046) granting a pension to Elizabeth Marshall;

A bill (S. 898) granting a pension to William A. Penfield;

A bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert; and

A bill (S. 1181) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Pierce.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1725) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Pierce, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 584) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship Railway Company, and for other purposes, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he reported a bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2115) granting to the Oregonian Railway Bridge Company of Oregon the right to construct a bridge over the Willamette River, in the vicinity of Ray's Landing, Oregon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5789) to amend section 2552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1991) supplementary to and amendatory of "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, as amended by an act to amend said act, approved July 5, 1884, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BROWN. I present the views of the minority of the Committee on Woman Suffrage on the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, and I ask that the same number of copies be printed as was ordered to be printed of the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be received and the order made as requested.

ADDITIONAL GROUND FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT WAYNE.

Mr. MAHONE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3775) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase an additional strip of ground on the east side of the United States court-house and post-office building at Fort Wayne, Ind., to be paid for out of the appropriation already made, to report it without amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, out of moneys already appropriated for the construction of the United States court-house and post-office building at Fort Wayne, Ind., a strip of land adjacent to the present site of the building and on the east thereof, having a frontage of 60 feet on Berry street and running back with same width to an alley; but in no event shall the cost of the additional land exceed the sum of $9,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill ought to have the usual provision in it for having the Attorney-General certify to the title before the money is paid. I move to amend the bill by adding the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no money shall be paid from the Treasury on account of the said purchase until the Attorney-General of the United States shall certify that the title to said land is complete in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 2279) for the relief of Samuel Tate; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2280) for the relief of R. D. Beckley and Leon Howard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2281) granting to railroads the right of way through the Indian reservation in Northern Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2282) to establish a weather bureau in the War Department, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Joint Commission to consider the question of the organizations of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 2283) amending the Revised Statutes relating to yachts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2284) granting a pension to James Moss; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2285) granting a pension to Mary E. Harris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2286) for the relief of Albert C. Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2287) for securing statistics of the extent and value of the vessel fisheries of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2289) to change the name of the Exchange National Bank of El Dorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2290) to change the name of the Wichita National Bank; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 135) granting a pension to Mary A. Tibbets;

A bill (S. 214) for the relief of Oscar Eastmond and James W. Atwill;

A bill (S. 364) granting a pension to Nancy Battorff;

A bill (S. 506) for the relief of Emerson Etheridge and William B. Stokes;

A bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot, near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company;

A bill (S. 1805) for the relief of Miss Rosa Wallace;

A bill (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina;

A bill (S. 2224) in aid of the national monument at Plymouth, Mass.; and

A bill (S. 2239) extending the time for the completion of the records of the clerk of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and the transfer of the same to the Department of State.

STATEMENT OF ADJOURNMENTS OVER.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senate to make an order in what is a very small matter indeed, but will make a great deal of difference in the convenience of Senators; that is that the RECORD be directed to publish at the end of the proceedings of the Senate and the House the time to which the bodies respectively adjourn. It is always declared by the Chair; but on Friday if you want to know whether the Senate or House will be in session on Saturday there is no way of ascertaining but by searching through the entire proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Reporter will be directed to insert at the close of the proceedings both of the House and the Senate the time to which the bodies respectively adjourn. That order is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. PLATT. I presume the Senator does not wish to have that done by motion so as to displace the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not displace it until 2 o'clock. At 2 o'clock the interstate-commerce bill will displace this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This motion only covers the morning hour.

Mr. CHACE. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me a few minutes in order that I may call up Senate bill 1908 in regard to postal cars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I was appealed to by the Senator from Rhode Island, who says he has to leave this afternoon at 3 o'clock, to allow him to take up that bill, which I do with the consent of the Senate, provided it will not lead to debate; but if it is going to occupy any length of time, I shall feel disposed to insist on my rights, whatever they may be, in reference to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CHACE. I ask for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

PAY FOR POSTAL CARS.

The PRESIDENT pre tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] asks unanimous consent to call up informally the bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes, providing for additional pay for postal cars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill and also the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That in adjusting, allowing, and paying amounts which have accrued, or may hereafter accrue, under section 4004 of the Revised Statutes, the Postmaster-General and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow and pay for cars less than 40 feet a sum which shall bear the same proportion to the sum allowed and paid for cars 40 feet long as the length of such cars bears to 40 feet.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHACE. I will state briefly the object of passing the bill. The present law, section 4004 of the Revised Statutes, provides that cars 40 feet in length, running 100 miles per day each way, shall be paid $25 per annum. The Department felt some hesitation in regard to paying for shorter cars, believing that the law did not justify them in doing so. The Postmaster-General himself has written a letter to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, in which he sets forth that the equities require that some such defining act as this should be passed. The object of this bill is to so define the law that the Departments may feel themselves authorized to pay relatively the same price for shorter cars.

Mr. HALE. There should be a verbal amendment in line 7, after the words "40 feet," by inserting the words "in length."

Mr. CHACE. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say that I was on the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices that reported the bill, and after a full investigation I think it is right and that the bill ought to pass as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS F. PURNELL.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Kansas in charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill to allow me a moment to pass a bill under peculiar circumstances which will not take two minutes.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Texas; but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] has to leave the city to-morrow or next day, and he desires to pass what is known as the 4th of July appropriation bill, about which I presume there will be no debate, and which we pass at every session of Congress. I do not want to seem to discriminate between Senators in regard to matters of this kind. I am willing, however, to yield to these two bills in case there is no objection on the part of any Senator to my doing so. At the end of that time I will not yield any further.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask unanimous consent, then, to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 950, being the bill (H. R. 2397) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It provides for the payment to Thomas F. Purnell, of Austin, Tex., of $1,000, in full reimbursement of that amount paid by Purnell on the 15th of April, 1875, as United States marshal for the western district of Texas, for the arrest of Peter McCartney, by order of J. L. Duckworth and L. B. Whitney, special agents of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road;

A bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.;

A bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River;

A bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid-Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River;

A bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cooke County, Texas; and

That it agreed to the respective conferences asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CRISP, Mr. BYNUM, and Mr. A. J. WEAVER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4731.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator had better ask unanimous consent for that, so as not to displace the appropriation bill.

Mr. PIKE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is simply a bill made up of 94 pages of names and sums. The first clause enacts that the following sums be paid. Then that list is a copy of the names and sums reported by the Treasury Department, which have been carefully compared always by the clerk of the committee with the vouchers; and I move that the first clause only be read.

Mr. PIKE. There is an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, there is an amendment at the end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks consent that the full reading of the bill shall be omitted. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, has the bill been read once at length?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, it has not been; it is a list of claims.

Mr. HARRIS. Fourth of July claims, as they are called.

Mr. INGALLS. We passed four hundred and twenty-six bills the other day without reading, I believe, one of them, and the proceeding appears to me in the Senate to be approaching the verge of excessive laxity. The rules require that every bill shall be once read at length in order that there may be the opportunity at least of knowing what it contains. There have already been serious difficulties arising from the unsatisfactory and imperfect and incomplete consideration of measures before us; and, if we proceed in this way, it will eventually come to this, that whenever a committee has vouched for the propriety of a bill it will be taken for granted and not read at all.

I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that this method has gone about as far as toleration should permit. Inasmuch as there is nothing requiring any particular haste——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me one moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me before he announces his determination about it, I should like to suggest to him that I entirely agree with him in his opinion as to the great care that the Senate should take, and that the reading of no bill should be omitted on the mere assurance that its provisions and enactments are reasonable and right; but this is a bill where from the necessity of the case the reading beyond the first clause would convey no information to any Senator whatever.

These claims are audited by the Treasury Department under the general law by one of the auditors. They are claims for paying certain Southern claimants, which it has been our policy always to pay since the war. The auditing officer takes the vouchers for those claims which come from the War Department, compares them, and reports to the House a list of those claims. Then the clerk of the Committee on Claims takes the vouchers and takes the bill, and compares the names and the sums with the vouchers. Here are ninety-four pages, consisting of probably an average of ten or fifteen claims on a page, all the bill being that there shall be paid from the Treasury the following sums: To A B, of Knox County, Louisiana, $119.40; to C D, of such a county in Georgia, $30.50, and so on.

What I propose is not to omit the reading of the operative part of the bill, but simply to omit the list of names and sums. Suppose this bill read, "There shall be paid the sum of $100,000 to the several persons mentioned in the report of the Auditor," nobody would consider that that was improper or improvident legislation because we did not put in the list all together but referred to the report in our enactment. Instead of that, they are set forth at length in the bill.

While I share with the Senator in his great strictness, I hope he will not put himself and the Senate to the trouble of spending two or three hours in reading that list of sums and names.

Mr. INGALLS. It would be a very great convenience to the Senate if all bills could be simply read by their titles and passed. We had yesterday eighteen or twenty bridge bills for crossing the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers; they were all substantially the same, and upon the assurance of the Committee on Commerce that they were in accordance with the precedents and contained the usual safeguards there would be no reason why they should be read at length. The same reasoning that the Senator from Massachusetts invokes for his proposition in regard to this bill would apply practically to everything. There is no reason why any bill should be read at length. It consumes the time of the Senate; the great majority of Senators do not attend to it; and it would be a great measure of convenience if we could simply place all this business in the hands of committees and let them transact the legislation of the Senate.

I, of course, do not propose to place my individual objection against the wish of a majority of the body; but I rise to say that the practice is vicious, it is full of possibilities of mischief. A few years ago we passed in lump without reading the revision of the statutes of the United States which had been sent here by a commission, and that was vouched for as being absolutely correct in every particular. That act was the parent of unnumbered woes. We never have recovered up to this time from the danger, the difficulty, the peril, the hazard, and the loss that came from that one act. We are proceeding step by step to break down every barrier that surrounds security and safety in legislation. An appeal is made to us, "This will take time; something else requires attention;" and we are asked to dispense with the reading of bills; and here comes in a measure involving I do not know the expenditure of how many hundred thousand dollars, and upon the bare statement that this has been carefully considered by a committee and compared with the official vouchers we are asked upon the reading of the enacting clause to allow this bill to pass without further consideration. I protest against it as vicious and in violation of the first principles of proper legislation. With that protest, sir, I have done.

Mr. MORRILL. This happens to be a bill that is sure to pass whether the Senator from New Hampshire, chairman of the committee, is present or not. It will only require to come up when we have the time to give to it to have the bill read. I think the Senator from New Hampshire should not persist in it this morning.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the reading of the first section of the bill, except the amendments proposed, shall be omitted. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. MORRILL. There is objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont object?

Mr. MORRILL. I will not object if nobody else feels like objecting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has listened attentively to hear an objection. The Chair will receive it yet if it is made. If not, the reading will be dispensed with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, at the end of the bill to add the following:

Mississippi:

To Catharine C. B. Merrill, executrix of the last will and testament of Ayres P. Merrill, late of said State, $67,726.

Mr. INGALLS. Sixty-seven thousand dollars is a very pretty sum, and of course I am willing to take amendments to this bill on the suggestion of the committee that they are all right; but it does appear to me that when we have lumped this bill as it has come from the committee to both Houses we ought not to be asked to adopt amendments of that magnitude without some explanation. Of course this may be right, and I presume that it is.

As I understand this bill, even the committee never considers it is a matter of clerical comparison; and we rely ultimately not on the examination by the committee of these items, but simply upon the statement of some clerk or employé that he has compared them with the vouchers and finds them to be correct, and the committee receive them on that statement and so report to the Senate. I should like to hear some explanation of the ground upon which we are requested to agree off-hand to an amendment adding $67,000 to this bill.

Mr. PIKE. This claim was presented at the last Congress and submitted to the Committee on Claims, and a law was passed in pursuance of the recommendation of that committee that the claim be referred to the Quartermaster-General for examination. He has examined it by special agent, and this amount has been allowed according to the report of the special agent. All the papers relating to it, which are voluminous, were submitted to the Senate at this session and sent to the Committee on Claims, and the matter was referred to Senator Jackson, of Tennessee, who was a member of the committee while he was in the Senate, for examination. He examined it thoroughly and reported this sum. The matter has been thoroughly examined, both by the Quartermaster-General or his special agent and by Senator Jackson, as well as by the committee. The amendment is the result of that examination. The sum reported by the Quartermaster-General was not quite as much as the committee thought should be allowed, but on a subsequent examination he became satisfied that we were right. The committee thought that this amendment was eminently just and ought to be allowed.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say a word more. This claim is allowed in behalf of Ayres P. Merrill, who was one of the most loyal men in the United States, North or South. He owned several plantations in the vicinity of Memphis, and when our army went there in July it took stores and supplies from his plantation. He was indorsed as a loyal man by General Grant and all our Union generals in that vicinity. He was also our minister to Belgium under Grant's administration. If there is a deserving and meritorious claim for this Congress to pass upon it is this one.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire why it is that this claim was not examined by the Quartermaster's Department under the law and reported, without the intervention of Congress? Is there anything, in other words, that takes this out of the general rule with reference to the examination of this class of claims?

Mr. PIKE. It was examined by the Quartermaster-General under a law passed by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. If I understand it the rule which Congress has uniformly adopted is this: that where supplies were actually taken for the use of the Army those supplies are to be paid for, unless there was a clear purpose to capture and take them as booty at the time, where the person is shown to have been a loyal man, at the value at which they were to the Army. For instance, if they took his house for fuel or his fence for fuel, you do not pay the value of the house or the fence but the value of the fuel. This class of claims comes under a general law. There are a great many of the claims which for various reasons have not yet been disposed of, and the vouchers are in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and they have an examination in the Quartermaster-General's Office of these claims, taking the vouchers from the military officers. They then send them to the Treasury, where they are audited, and the list of these claims examined on that principle comes to Congress.

This man had some reason, which is not now in my memory, why he did not put his claim in the office within the time in which it should have been put in. The Committee on Claims were entirely satisfied, however, that there was some good reason. I can not now tell from memory what it was; but I suppose it appears in the report of last year. Thereupon Congress, instead of allowing the claim specially, passed a law requiring the Quartermaster's Department to examine it, and if he found it to be just and reasonable then to report it specially to this Congress, which he did, and it has been proposed by the committee to be added to this bill, the report having come in.

In regard to the loyalty of Mr. Merrill, there was a special and careful re-examination of the whole subject by Senator Jackson of the subcommittee on claims. The general committee, of course, could not go over all the details of the loss. He was a man of conspicuous loyalty. There was a very emphatic letter from General Grant indorsing his loyalty and his great services to our Army. He was once the minister to Belgium under General Grant's appointment after the war.

Mr. DAWES. I think I can state the reason why the application was not made within the time prescribed by the statute.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague will let me state that we supposed we passed on that matter last year.

Mr. DAWES. This gentleman was broken down entirely in health physically and mentally. He was taken abroad by his friends in an attempt to recover his health, and during that time he was without any knowledge of the legislation that required the presentation of this claim within a certain time. If my memory of the facts serves me, that was the reason why a special act was necessary. He came back and spent several years in my own town in a vain search for health, broken down, a child almost, taken care of by his friends. He was, as my colleague says, one of the most conspicuously loyal and cultivated gentlemen in the neighborhood where he lived. He was a very intelligent man—I knew him well—who had taken care of his own affairs, but was entirely broken down, unable to know or to have any idea of what his claim was and what was necessary to enforce it. I think that must be the reason, although I am not ready to state it personally.

Mr. HOAR. I did not know that particular fact that he had been connected with Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. He came there from the South. He had no connection with Massachusetts at all, but he happened to come to my town in search of health, and I happened to know this and I desired to make the statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the amount proposed in the amendment is the amount proposed by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. HOAR. It is the Quartermaster-General who reported a less sum, if I am not mistaken in my recollection. Then he re-examined it himself carefully and amended his report, being satisfied that this was the proper sum.

Mr. PLUMB. The first clause of this bill requires the Secretary of the Treasury—

To pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, since January 21, 1885, namely.

That description of the class of claims which are to be the subject of this appropriation does not cover this amendment, which it is proposed to insert at the close of the bill. Therefore, in order to make this bill harmonious in all its parts, and in order to enable the Treasury Department to pay this claim if it is to be paid, we have got to amend other portions of the bill. I think this amendment had better be left out, and I will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts who first spoke on this matter to the fact that a similar claim was left out of the bill last year, and the committee took it up and reported it in a special bill this year, which has passed the Senate already; and the argument in favor of that was that it had gone through the same machinery that this amendment had gone through and therefore it passed through the Senate without opposition and without debate, I think. It seems to me, therefore, that this amendment should be left out. It should be made, as it always has been, a bill for the appropriation of money to pay claims which have passed through the accounting officers, who only were, under the law, entitled to consider such claims. If we adopt the plan of putting on this amendment, then why not put on a public-building bill, an appropriation for a public building? Why not put on any other one of a dozen different classes of claims that we legislate on here during the session, and use this bill, which is bound to go through, as the vehicle whereby they may be passed without opposition.

I hope that this amendment will not be adopted, and that this bill will remain, what it always has been, a bill to carry out the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, and for the payment of claims audited thereunder since the date of the passage of the former bill.

Now, I want to say further that I think these classes of claims are liable to be, and no doubt they have been in a great many cases, unduly swollen. Referring now to the bill which I mentioned a moment ago having been found on our record, I found on an examination that it was to pay for timber taken off 120 acres of land in Tennessee, and the amount was $4,000, more than by any possibility the land and timber both could have been worth. So we are going on year after year passing these bills without any kind of scrutiny, and putting on, as the committee propose to do, a class of claims which have not passed the proper scrutiny of the officers of the Treasury Department, running, I think, still greater risks of doing that which we ought not to do in reference to public money.

I do not know that this is subject to a point of order. I presume it is not; but I hope that the Senators who have charge of the matter will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. This claim has been examined into by the Quartermaster-General like all other items provided for in the bill and reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. At the last session of Congress another claim was allowed and attached to the 4th of July bill precisely as this is. That precedent is followed in this case. No trouble arose from that, and it seems to me none can from this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EUNICE E. CLARK.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish the Senate to agree to a conference on the bill (H. R. 6429) to grant a pension to Eunice E. Clark. The House has declined to concur in the amendment of the Senate and has asked for a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. COLQUITT were appointed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Post-Office appropriation bill is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99, section 1, to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, it has been often said on this floor, and it was repeated yesterday, that I have, "in season and out of season," and more frequently out of season than in, introduced the discussion of questions bearing upon tariff taxation, commerce, and kindred subjects. I hope the Senate will do me the justice to say that I am not guilty of starting this controversy. I endeavored to dispose of it, as I think it should be disposed of by the President of the Senate, on a question of order, regarding it as a matter that is certainly new legislation on an appropriation bill, as it gives powers and rights to the Postmaster-General and to American steamship companies that neither has now by law. I insist that the Senate has declared very emphatically by its rules and the oft-repeated declarations of its leading members on both sides that appropriation bills shall not contain new legislation, but must be limited to provisions carrying out existing laws. The House of Representatives has amended its rules so as to correspond with ours, and has faithfully lived up to them. So far it has tendered to us nothing in any appropriation bill that any one can charge is new legislation. That being so, I think it would be very bad policy for the Senate now to break over the rules that itself has established, to overthrow the principle which the House is endeavoring earnestly and honestly to carry out, by tacking on to this bill legislation which, it is conceded, is not in the interest of the postal service; indeed, is not looking to the postal service but looking to the building up of our commercial relations?

It will be conceded by all that every appropriation bill that has come from the House has come in such shape that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have had no sort of trouble with it. The Indian appropriation bill, which in former years has frequently been discussed for weeks, was, this year, so clean that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who took special charge of it, accepted it almost as it came from the House of Representatives, and this Post-Office appropriation bill, until this subsidy clause was attached, has met with no sort of opposition either in the committee or the Senate.

I propose to stand by the action of the House and by the rules of the Senate, and to insist that appropriation bills shall, as we have agreed in both Houses that they shall, contain no new legislation. We have had trouble enough on that question. Let us provide under existing laws for carrying on the Government in its various departments as we think it ought to be carried on. Limiting ourselves to that, it is perfectly obvious that the two Houses are going to have no difficulty and no disagreement. But if we are going to launch into a new sea of legislation; if we are going to insist that hereafter the Postmaster-General shall use none but American-built ships; that he shall make contracts for five years or longer, and needlessly squander large sums of money against his protest—I repeat, if we are going to confront the House with propositions of that sort, then there is no telling where our appropriation bills will end or what will become of them.

I insist that it is bad policy, to use a mild term, for a Republican Senate, in violation of its own rules, to seek to force upon this administration duties and responsibilities that do not exist by law, against the protest of the President and his Postmaster-General, because the President of the United States has protested against this class of legislation, and the Postmaster-General has in every way possible protested against it, the House would not even consider it, and now we are asked to insert it against the protest of the President, against the protest of the Postmaster-General, and against the protest of the House of Representatives.

The President in his message to Congress uttered no uncertain sound in regard to a substantially similar provision in the law of last year, one that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said was precisely similar to his proposition. In that he is somewhat mistaken, his proposed amendment being more stringent than the existing law, which reads thus:

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails: For transportation of foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000. And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half of the sum hereby appropriated.

The proposed amendment of the Senator from Maine, among other things, makes it mandatory instead of discretionary. I may as well read it:

Amendment reported by Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, and intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1887, namely: Strike out lines 80, 81, and 82 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails: For transportation of foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $1,000,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed," &c.

In the present law it reads he is "hereby authorized"

"to enter into contracts with American built and registered steamships whenever possible."

The existing law uses the words "carried on American steamships." Doubtless the new phraseology was strengthened by the Senator under the apprehension that a law might be passed authorizing the American people to buy ships somewhere else, or for fear that some repaired wrecked ship might be allowed an American register under special laws. Doubtless the Senator from Maine determined to cover both questions by inserting that he "is hereby directed to enter into contracts with American built and registered steamships," so that no ship by any possibility could obtain the proposed bounty that had not been built here, although she might be purchased and registered under our laws.

When that amendment came to the Committee on Appropriations it was made apparent by the Postmaster-General that it might be so detrimental to the public service that even the majority of the committee were unwilling to go that far. The Postmaster-General showed that it would be absurd in the great transatlantic lines where first-class steamers go almost every day, carrying the mails in seven or eight days to Europe, to be compelled to employ any American steamer that might be disposed to demand the mails and take thirteen or fourteen days for the voyage, a ship loaded with petroleum perhaps, and thus deprive the people of existing facilities for fast mails. He made that so apparent that even the majority of the committee would not submit to it. They limited the operation of the subsidy to the cases set forth in the amendment which I now propose to read:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Senators will observe that this amendment limits it to certain classes of ships and to certain lines, such as the South American and Australian, and leaves out all provisions in regard to advertising and awarding the contracts to the lowest bidder, because in all but two of these lines there is no competition; and this amendment does not limit the subsidy to the present appropriation as the existing law does, and as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine did, but it directs the Postmaster-General to make contracts for five years without advertisement or competition, so as to secure the service to the lowest bidder. It proposes simply to give the service and the subsidy to the people who have the ships in that particular trade now. Therefore, this amendment is worse than any that has been proposed, far worse than the existing law, or, if you please, far better for the men to whom it is proposed to make this donation. In regard to all propositions of that character, as I said, the President of the United States in his message to Congress was decidedly opposed, as I propose to show. The President says:

It was decided, with my approbation, after a sufficient examination, to be inexpedient for the Post-Office Department to contract for carrying our foreign mails under the additional authority given by the last Congress. The amount limited was inadequate to pay all within the purview of the law the full rate of 50 cents per mile, and it would have been unjust and unwise to have given it to some and denied it to others. Nor could contracts have been let under the law to all at a rate to have brought the aggregate within the appropriation, without such practical prearrangement of terms as would have violated it.

The rate of sea and inland postage, which was proffered under another statute, clearly appears to be a fair compensation for the desired service, being three times the price necessary to secure transportation by other vessels upon any route, and much beyond the charges made to private persons for services not less burdensome.

Some of the steamship companies, upon the refusal of the Postmaster-General to attempt, by the means provided, the distribution of the sum appropriated as an extra compensation, withdrew the services of their vessels and thereby occasioned slight inconvenience, though no considerable injury, the mails having been dispatched by other means.

Whatever may be thought of the policy of subsidizing any line of public conveyance or travel, I am satisfied that it should not be done under cover of an expenditure incident to the administration of a Department, nor should there be any uncertainty as to the recipients of the subsidy, or any discretion left to an executive officer as to its distribution. If such gifts of the public money are to be made for the purpose of aiding any enterprise, in the supposed interest of the public, I can not but think that the amount to be paid, and the beneficiary, might better be determined by Congress than in any other way.

The President does not mince his words. He knows and asserts that this is a subsidy, a gift, a donation that he does not desire to dispense, one that the Post-Office Department can not properly apply in the interest of the public service, and one which if forced upon our executive officers would be to the detriment of the public welfare.

Gentlemen on the other side have not been slow in endeavoring to embarrass this administration in every way that they thought they could secure political advantage. I think they are straining the point too far when they seek to force on the President and his executive officers, against their will, and when they protest it will injure the service if they are required to use this large amount of public money, taken from the tax-payers, to give to anybody as a subsidy, a bounty, or a gift, no matter how plausibly or artfully disguised. The Postmaster-General is not less emphatic in his protest against this subsidy.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that there would be any real practical difficulty in the Post-Office Department, as a matter of administration, distributing and spending this fund, provided that Congress, upon the policy of stretching out and opening and securing this foreign trade, should pass this amendment on this bill?

Mr. BECK. We would get no foreign trade that we have not now, by reason of this subsidy, as I will show. Of course the Postmaster-General can divide it out. The companies last year showed him how he could do so; but he regarded it as a gift to them, and not as a payment for any service they proposed to render, as I hope to prove before I am through.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator quite gets the scope of my question. The Senator speaks of the Post-Office Department being embarrassed if this is forced upon that Department. Now, does the Senator believe there would be any practical difficulty if Congress adopts the policy involved in this amendment in carrying it out? Where would be the embarrassment provided the Postmaster-General in good faith sought to carry out this policy?

Mr. BECK. This condition would cause embarrassment; a foreign vessel might be running to any of these ports and a subsidized American ship running side by side; the Postmaster-General might know that the foreign ship would reach there five days or ten days ahead of the American ship; it is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed and the mails carried by all proper facilities and with the utmost speed; but if he is required and directed wherever it is possible—and it is possible no matter how slow the vessel may be—to give that bounty to an American ship he would be required to do it to the detriment of the service and of all the men engaged in commerce when he sends the mail in a ship that will take ten days longer to reach the same point than the foreign ship, starting side by side with her will, especially when it is willing to do the work for one-fourth of the price.

Mr. HALE. But that is not a question of difficulty in administration.

Mr. BECK. I think it is.

Mr. HALE. Supposing that Congress adopts the policy laid down in this amendment and directs the Postmaster-General to send these mails in the lines run by United States citizens, built in United States yards, providing the rate of compensation, believing that a result from that in the future will be the opening of trade and a dispatch equal to that of any foreign ship, is there anything for the Postmaster-General to do but to bow his will to the mandate of Congress?

Mr. BECK. I assure the Senator there can be no two opinions about that. When Congress sees fit to order and direct the Postmaster-General do anything, and he undertakes willfully to violate the law, no matter how absurd it may be, he can be impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate; no one doubts that. But he is endeavoring (and it is the business of Congress to aid him if we propose to do our duty) to carry on the Post-Office Department so as to give the best service to all the people at home and abroad that he can, and he would be doing the country and every man engaged in its commerce gross injustice, and this law would require him to do gross injustice to all the people of the country for whose benefit the Department is administered, if he is to be compelled to send the mails by a slow vessel that would take twice as long to perform the service as another ship starting side by side with her. We can compel him to do it—we can compel him to do almost anything; but it is against requiring that absurd condition of things that the President protests, and that the Postmaster-General protests, and that I protest.

The Senator from Maine has to admit, as all the other advocates of this subsidy have, that his object in this amendment is not to facilitate the carriage of the mails, but it is to give a bounty to certain steamship lines under the hope—I will not say pretense—that they will build up foreign trade. That is a subject which belongs to the Committee on Commerce; that is a matter that can be properly considered when we are dealing with commercial relations; I think the Postmaster-General states his objections very well in the following language in his annual report to Congress:

Much has been said about employing the postal appropriation to aid American commerce. When Congress shall desire to invest the Post-Office Department with care for that object, it can not be doubted it will easily choose language which will plainly convey the purpose and impose the duty. Until then that Department can not rightfully employ the moneys appropriated for the postal service to secure objects not intrusted to its care, however meritorious in themselves.

It may be properly further observed of this, that during many years the practice of granting pecuniary aid to American lines was pursued at so great a cost, and to so little advantage, that it was long since wholly abandoned; that when followed, Congress had directed it; and if that body designed its renewal, presumably it would again have declared the purpose.

But the policy of subsidizing American steamship companies, or any of them, is not involved in the decision arrived at. That pertains to Congress instead of the Department, and therefore the Department can only award just compensation and then stop. If exigencies may arise to justify its adoption it seems to belong to that body to recognize their existence and prescribe the object and amount of the grant.

The Postmaster-General adds:

No exigency exists for the establishment of any new lines to carry the mails. Those now on the sea as common carriers are sufficient for the present needs of the foreign mail service. They appear to have maintained themselves for years without Government bounty in profitable pursuit of their business.

I think it is obvious that both the President and the Postmaster-General deny either the necessity or propriety of granting the subsidy, and protest against its being placed in their hands under the pretense that it is needed for mail purposes. The Post-Office appropriation bill purports to deal only with post-office matters and purports to make appropriations to carry on that service and that only. Therefore waiving the point of order for the time being, which I think was well taken and which I expect to insist upon, I insist that it is embarrassing to the administration to impose such duties upon its officers as to divide out this subsidy among any set of men, however meritorious their work may be, outside of carrying such mails as are needed. The Postmaster-General said in his report that we had tried the effect of this subsidy business before without success. I may as well pause here and show how often—I have the list and the results are known—they were all failures. We have subsidized lines, these same lines, time and again, and our trade and commerce have not increased. We are now at the lowest point we ever reached in the ocean carrying trade, under 15 per cent. of our own, and doing nothing outside of it.

In 1861 we appropriated $350,000 per annum for tri-monthly mail service from New York to San Francisco via Panama, and a contract was made with Cornelius Vanderbilt. In 1864 Congress authorized subsidized monthly mail communication between the United States and Brazil by first-class sea-going vessels of not less than 2,000 tons burden, sufficient in number to perform twelve round voyages per annum from the ports of the United States to Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, Bahia, and Pernambuco, the expense not to exceed $150,000 a year for ten years from September, 1865. Under its provisions the Postmaster-General entered into a contract with the New York and Brazil Steamship Company, and expended $1,500,000.

The act of February 17, 1867, authorized the Postmaster-General to invite proposals for transporting the foreign mails from San Francisco to China and Japan, to go into effect January 1, 1867. The act limited the expenditure to $500,000 per annum. Under this act the Pacific Mail Steamship Company received a compensation of $4,583,333.32, covering a period of ten years. Then we made a similar contract to carry to the Hawaiian Islands, for which we expended $425,000.

And yet in the face of these subsidies going to Vanderbilt, then to the Roach line, then to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company of which nobody is proud, I believe for nothing I understand came out of it but corruption, there was no increase to any appreciable extent whatever of the commerce or trade of the United States with those countries.

I have before me the statistics of the trade with Brazil and other countries during the time of the subsidized lines and before and after the subsidy ceased, and it is painfully apparent that there was no appreciable increase of commerce that ever came to us by reason of any subsidies ever granted to any of these lines. On the contrary, our carrying trade, notwithstanding all these efforts, has been dwindling year by year, until now, according to the last report, it is less than 15 per cent. of our own trade when these subsidies began—after the war, after all the damage done by the Alabama and the other cruisers of which so much has been said, it was over 30 per cent. It has gone gradually and steadily downward, downward all the time in the face of all subsidies. So it will continue as long as our miserable tariff system and antiquated navigation laws are permitted to exist. Subsidies only aggravate; they are not even as good as bread pills to fever patients.

But I will read again from the Postmaster-General's report before I forget it, or am led away from it, because he is the best authority in regard to the management of the affairs of his own Department and its requirements. He says:

No special contract for the transportation of any foreign mail was made or in force during the past year with either foreign or domestic carriers; but the policy, satisfactorily pursued during many years, of sending the mails by whatever vessel could most expeditiously and properly transport them at such times and to such ports as its business required it to sail, continued to be observed with good results.

That is what he desires to be allowed to do hereafter; that is what good administration requires. Anything that deprives him of that right embarrasses the proper management of his great Department.

The Senator from Maine asked me if he could not be compelled to obey the law. Of course he can; but as he shows the proposed change limiting his right to a certain class of ships that may not be sailing when his mails are ready to go and when other ships are about to sail at the time he desires the mails to start that may go to the same point faster, carrying the mails more safely—that he is deprived of by the insertion of the provision under discussion. It embarrasses the good administration of the Department. We can, of course, force him to obey any law we may pass, however embarrassing or detrimental it may be.

The Postmaster-General proceeds:

The gross weight of our sea-borne mails of all kinds (except such as were dispatched to Canada) during the year was 1,226,929,130 grams, or 2,705,378 pounds; of which the weight of letter and post-card mail was 222,267,094 grams, or 490,099 pounds, and of printed and other matter 1,004,662,036 grams, or 2,215,280 pounds. Of letter mail—

Observe what a small percentage of service is now performed by the ships we are asked to subsidize by this amendment—

91.63 per cent. was transatlantic, and but 8.37 per cent was transmitted to the countries and adjacent islands of this continent and across the Pacific seas.

Ninety-one per cent of our mails will be carried independent of this subsidy by other ships where we have no American lines, and they will be carried for less that $300,000 while we are to pay $800,000 to carry the other 8 per cent. and deprive the Department of the right to use any of the ships of other nations that are going to the same ports, though as I said they might go faster, do the business better, and at one-fourth of the cost. The Postmaster-General continues:

The total cost of the service by carriers directly employed was $331,903.24, of which $270,908.72 were paid for transatlantic, $22,124.44 for trans-Pacific, and $38,870.08 for the American continental carriage. So far as can be stated from adjustments made, the charges of foreign postal administrations for carrying our mails during the year amount to $104,797.80.

I do not care to read all the argument. It is conclusive against the whole subsidy system so far as mails are concerned, from a business standpoint. The Postmaster-General proceeds to speak of the controversy he had with the subsidized companies in regard to the disposition of the money that was appropriated last year. He states it better than I can:

A statement, compiled in the office of the foreign mails, shows the total miles sailed last year, and to have been expected to be sailed this year by all American companies, to be over two million and fifty thousand; and the total compensation at the maximum rate would exceed $1,025,000, or over two and one-half times the utmost authorized expenditure. The act requires a letting to the lowest responsible bidder after legal advertisement to invite competition; and except to contractors so brought into service, no money could be paid on mileage contracts. Only two routes are navigated by more than one American company; one between New York and Havana, the other between San Francisco and Japan and China. To have solicited competition by advertisement would have been idle, except upon these; no competition to bring the bids below the maximum rate was possible. The consequence seems undeniable that the Department must either have made choice of certain routes, whose total mileage would have demanded no more than the limited sum, and, by ostentatiously calling through advertisement for a competition which could not come, have distributed the whole bounty to the chosen, entirely excluding the others; or else have so planned its advertisements to meet the circumstances of the only possible bidders that, by concerted understanding with all American companies, or such as the Department chose to give the money to, contracts might have been made for such sums to each that the whole appropriation would be divided between them.

The first method of expending the money would have been partial and unjust. There are no circumstances, it may be safely affirmed, which give any American line the right to be so greatly preferred that it should be paid the full bounty while others should receive none. And to have so administered the authority would have defeated the objects of the appropriation; since, it may well be supposed, the disfavored lines would promptly and justifiably have refused their further service as mail-carriers to the Government.

There may be reason to think that the Government ought to award these companies differing measures of compensation, not depending on their varying mileage so much as upon other facts, perhaps; but no lawful right or means to discriminate between them is afforded by the statute, which requires the contract, if advertised for, to be let to the lowest responsible bidder.

The objections to the first plan of administering the authority being obviously insuperable, it was intimated to the Department that it might expect all the companies to conform their bids to such limitation as should be suggested as necessary, if the advertisements for proposals were adapted to that end.

They were willing, in other words, to arrange among themselves to take the money; they did not care how, so they got it; they would see that it was put in proper shape so that they could divide it, and not quarrel over it, and not do any work to earn it either. Their friends in Congress had given it to them and they wanted it. Again he says:

But the act unmistakably contemplated by its terms that the Government should secure the gain of competition wherever possible among bidders. The two routes already mentioned afforded the opportunity. Yet, if the law were pursued and a contract were awarded to either of the companies on the trans-Pacific route, and another to either of those plying between New York and Havana, both public injury and private injustice would have been wrought, because the public would have lost the service of one company on each route when it ought to enjoy the greater frequency of both, and one company on each would have been denied a share of the bounty to which it was as well entitled as the other. This constituted in itself so grave an objection to any employment of the authority of the act as to render it of doubtful expediency, a proof of which lies in the usages of the transatlantic carriage, where the best service is gained by employing at will the swiftest ship among those ready to sail at any time when mail is to be dispatched, no special contracts being made.

That is what the President and the Post-Office Department desire; that is what good administration requires; that is what all men corresponding with each other desire. Telegraphs and telephones and every means of expediting communication are now sought for with avidity. The fastest trains and the safest and cheapest lines are what the people demand. The Government is only acting as the agent of individual men in forwarding their mail to further their interests and promote their enterprises. The people have a right to demand that all the means which are available in the hands of their trustee, the head of the Post-Office Department, shall be put in use to give them those facilities. They pay the money to have the service rendered. At the low rate of postage we charge now fifty millions are paid by the people for postal service. I deny the legitimate right of Congress—I admit the power but deny the right—to deprive men who are engaged in commerce or trade, or even in social intercourse, to have their mails lie at any port when a ship is ready to take them, a safe ship and a fast ship, at a low rate, until a subsidized vessel can get ready to go, for no better reason than that her proprietors may get an unreasonable subsidy and the people be deprived of the benefit of the fastest and the best service. That is not just. That is class legislation; that is the worst sort of discrimination. It is a bounty paid out of the Treasury from money coerced from the tax-payers of the country, who are interested and desire their letters to go, as they have a right to insist they shall if Congress will allow their agents to perform their duties faithfully, in the quickest and safest way, and our officials avow they desire to do it in that way.

I read again from the report of the Postmaster-General:

A proof of which—

All I have said—

A proof of which lies in the usages of the transatlantic carriage, where the best service is gained by employing at will the swiftest ship among those ready to sail at any time when mail is to be dispatched, no special contracts being made.

To obviate this obstacle lying in the path of the second proposed plan, the further suggestion came that two contracts should be made on each of these routes, one suited to the conveniences of each company, and the advertisements be accordingly framed to solicit proposals for stated sailings, such as were habitually made by these lines. Thus, between New York and Havana, as one company regularly sails on Thursday and the other on Saturday, one advertisement should invite proposals to contract for a Thursday departure, another for a Saturday.

That would have been a nice one-sided agreement, no competition possible for Thursday, no competition possible for Saturday. It was an easy way of dividing the bounty between them and violating the law by having no competition at all, that is what the Postmaster-General was abused in the newspapers for not agreeing to do. He adds:

To warrant such a procedure this act must be read as directing the Department to distribute $100,000 among American steamship companies in return for their carrying the mails, in such manner as it might deem fairest between them, and most ingeniously evasive of its written purpose to secure competition and award the contract to the lowest bidder.

That is a fair statement of the case.

There were objections to this course other than the indicated one of indecent abuse of power granted the head of a Department for one purpose, that it might be available for another.

That is what this amendment accomplishes, ostensibly granted for one purpose, the purpose professedly being to facilitate mails, when in fact it is detrimental to that service, in order that it may be available for another, and that other is without consideration or benefit to anybody to put the money into the pockets of a few men or a few corporations who are sailing American-built ships with a monopoly of our great coastwise trade, given to them as a bounty for building them.

Again I quote:

It may well be doubted whether some of the companies would have assented to the unfair rule of division proposed—whereby they who carried the heavy and important mails took ratably more than they whose services were comparatively insignificant—unless driven to it by the inability of ingenuity to devise another method to escape the practical inconveniences of distribution which the language of the act created.

That illustrates how hollow the pretense is that the pay is to be given for mail service. One might have a thousand letters and another ten letters, still the pay would be the same, the object being bounty. An equal division had to be made or a quarrel would ensue; therefore, in all their propositions they were willing to consent to a division of the spoils regardless of service.

I do not care to occupy so much time in reading; the Postmaster-General shows that Hon. James Campbell, then Postmaster-General, in a report made to Congress in 1856, showed that he had a very broad general authority given to him by the act of March 3, 1845, yet that it was so plain that it ought not to be exercised and would have been so detrimental to the good of the postal service if enforced that he and all his predecessors had refused to exercise it.

Presumably—

Says the Postmaster-General in another place—

it was supposed additional power might become necessary to secure the service, because the compulsory law had been repealed. But no duty is enjoined to spend this appropriation needlessly more than another. As with every such grant of money for the public use, the true mandate of this law to its executive officer is plain; to honestly use so much of the sum provided as shall be reasonably necessary and may be rightly used to procure the transportation of the mails, and no more. At that point the law bids him to stop, not enlarge, expenditure. No duty is more imperatively imposed than the latter; none more justly due the people.

The true rule seems to be that the Department ought, when the Congress submits the question to its discretion, to pay such reasonable price to its carriers as, in fair dealing between them and the people, shall justly recompense their service, in view of its nature and the cost and burden of their performance of it.

Accordingly inquiry was carefully directed to ascertain what is a just compensation to our mail-carriers by sea, and whether it could be paid under the pre-existing powers of the Department. Tables are annexed which show the business done by each American steamship line for the postal service during the past year, the weight of mail carried by each vessel, the price paid, and what it would have been at the full rates charged on the same line for freights, what at parcel-dispatch rates, and what if the sea and inland postage had been paid. Other tables show the similar features of the transatlantic lines.

If I do not forget it I propose to show that the Postmaster-General made the proposition to give these American companies both the sea and inland postages, which under the law he had a right to do, but the companies refused to receive them and refused to carry our mails after having induced us to repeal the law that required them to carry all mails offered. Foreign ships can only get the sea postages. Both sea and inland were offered the American lines; they refused to take them in order to demand this subsidy. They combined against their own country, hoping that it could not get mail service rendered at all unless they were subsidized. I will read one more extract from the report:

It will be seen at once from the accompanying tables that if the quantity of mail carried be considerable the compensation is generous. The total weight of the transatlantic mails carried from New York last year by eight lines of ships was 2,194,066 pounds, and at sea postage yielded to the carriers $270,157.63, the compensation varying from $2,854.39 for the most profitable trip to 19 cents for the lightest, and averaging $609.36 per trip the year through. This was over thirty-four times what the same weight of freight would have been transported for, and nearly four times the charge for parcels of dispatch matter of the same quantity; and these rates increase in disproportion on the better trips on which, in fact, the mail was chiefly carried. These figures prove the rate of sea postage to be abundant. Undoubtedly the transatlantic carriage could be procured at lower rates, if it were desirable to forego frequency of transmission and employ but one or two lines instead of all.

The American lines have received a less compensation in amount only because the mails they carried have been so small in quantity. But 8.37 per cent. of our foreign letter mails last year was sent to all the countries and islands of this continent and across the Pacific seas, and not so much by all the American steamships. To some American lines the rate of payment has been greater than sea postage. To all but three the compensation has been more than would have been demanded by them for the same matter carried for individuals at express rates; and in the excepted three cases but a little less. Altogether the Government paid them nearly one-third more than a private person would have found necessary to procure the same transportation; and the carriers generally received more pecuniary advantage than is represented by the payments made them by the Government.

The companies have been in existence for years as common carriers, with a view to the gains of that business, not primarily as Government carriers; and have been employed by the Government in the same general manner as by other shippers, to transport such matter as it offered at such times and to such ports as the vessel sailed in the regular pursuit of their business, no regulations as to speed, frequency, times of departure or arrival, or otherwise, being imposed. No greater service is now desired of them, or necessary.

Observe the difference in the obligations and liabilities imposed upon the ships that are employed in the coastwise trade carrying our mails. They have to run on schedule time; they have to land and deliver mails at the different post-offices whether they have other business or not; of course, their compensation has to be higher than that of ocean ships in order to pay their expenses; first, because they have to run on schedule time; next, because they are subject to all the penalties of stage-coaches for delay in making mail delivery unless they can convince the Department that they were not in fault whenever there is a failure. They must run whether they have freight or not; they are part of our domestic mail system, but where the mails are sent for which this subsidy is proposed, they go on ships that start when they please and land when they please. They are under no obligations to deliver mails on any schedule time or render us any service except as incidental to their other business; they carry it to suit themselves.

Mr. CONGER. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him whether there is any such requirement on foreign ships that might carry the same mails after they leave our shores?

Mr. BECK. I did not hear distinctly.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator says there is no obligation on these American vessels going to these points to run on any schedule time or to land in any particular manner. Is there any such requirement on foreign ships that might carry the same mails after they left our shores?

Mr. BECK. None.

Mr. CONGER. So that there is no difference in that respect?

Mr. BECK. The foreign ships are now carrying the mails for the sea postage alone; but the Postmaster-General is willing, and I think everybody else is willing, not only to give the American ship the sea postage but to give it the inland postage as well, which in many cases more than doubles the sea postage for doing precisely what the foreign ship now does for sea postage only. But this amendment which we are considering proposes to pay $800,000 a year, regardless of the value of the service rendered, for five years for carrying 8 per cent. of our foreign mails, whereas the foreign ships and such American ships as are now paid the sea postage across the Atlantic are carrying 91 per cent. of our mails for about $300,000. That is what I object to.

Mr. CONGER. If the argument of the Senator as to schedule time and the requirement to land and deliver mails at particular points is worth anything as to the kind of service rendered, the objection is just as great against the present service in foreign ships as it would be in American ships.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Therefore the argument drops.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. It is one thing to pay $300,000 to have 91 per cent. of our work done, and another and a very different thing to pay $800,000 to have 8 per cent. of like work done. If the ships that want to get $800,000 for 8 per cent. of the work can show that they are under more obligation to land and must make schedule time or do anything else; in short, if it can be shown that those ships are under obligation to do other service than those carrying 91 per cent. for $300,000, there might be some pretense for the subsidy. Surely if they fail to show something as an excuse for extra compensation they ought not to be paid $800,000 for 8 per cent. of our mail service when 91 per cent. is done for $300,000.

So much that is misleading has been always said in the debates on this subject in regard to the high prices paid to the steamship lines that carry our domestic mails as compared even with the subsidy now proposed that when the Senator from Michigan asked me the question he did I was not making any contrast between American ships and foreign ships on the high seas; I was trying to show that as between American ships on the high seas, that had no schedule time, no obligations, no penalties or forfeitures for failures, that they were not entitled to anything like the same amount of compensation as steamers on the great lakes and rivers of the country or in the coastwise trade which carry our mails, because in our interior service and our coastwise service they have to run on schedule time, freight or no freight, in all sorts of weather, and are fined and punished if they do not come up to all the Post-Office requirements, no part of which penalty is imposed on ocean steamers, whether foreign or domestic. That was the thought I was trying to impress upon Senators. The ocean steamer is not obliged to go until she is ready and has her cargo. She goes as a freight carrier, while the other goes as a mail carrier whether she has freight or not, and must of course be paid for the risks she takes by our order as well as for the work she does.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator has said that he is willing to pay more to the American ship for carrying the mail than the sea-postage.

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. CONGER. The amount in this bill is no more than the excess of receipts for the sea service and the land service of that mail; it is confined to that, as I understand.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; it pays for the mail whether they carry one letter or a thousand letters.

Mr. CONGER. I do not mean on that particular boat, but I mean in the aggregate service of the foreign mails.

Mr. BECK. I think it does very much. The law, until it was repealed a few years ago by the clamor of the steamship companies, required—

The master of any vessel of the United States, bound from any port therein to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port of the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post-Office Department, or any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, shall offer; and he shall promptly deliver the same, on arriving at the port of destination, to the proper officer, for which he shall receive 2 cents for every letter so delivered; and upon the entry of every such vessel returning from any foreign port the master thereof shall make oath that he has promptly delivered all the mail placed on board said vessel before clearance from the United States; and if he shall fail to make such oath the vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States. (Section 3976, Revised Statutes.)

Section 4009 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea-postage, on the mail so transported.

When this controversy arose between the Postmaster-General and these companies he offered to pay them both the sea and the inland postage; and in his report is a table showing what that would be. It makes a very fair, indeed quite large, compensation for the carrying of our mails.

After they had the law repealed they thought they could compel the Postmaster-General to do whatever they pleased, therefore they demanded the whole subsidy, refused to receive the mail, rejecting the offer of sea and inland postage thus offered.

The Postmaster-General says:

Rejecting the offer of sea and inland postage, the several companies named, except the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company, refused from and after the 1st of August last to carry other mails than such as were dispatched to those countries with which they had made contracts requiring the service.

The report shows how they tried to prevent him from having the mail carried at all, indeed their whole conduct shows that they had not only no regard for the interests of the people or the good of the service, but were actuated by such selfish, sordid considerations that they are not entitled either to bounties, subsides, or anything beyond what the service they render is worth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be informally laid aside in order that the consideration of the appropriation bill may be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion? The Chair hears no objection. The special order will be informally laid aside and the Post-Office appropriation bill continued.

Mr. BECK. I find I am taking longer time than I expected.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one thing. He says the Postmaster-General was entirely willing to pay the sea and inland postage, which was 5 cents, and he knew of no one who was unwilling to allow that. I call his attention to the appropriation bill he is considering as it came from the House, that instead of appropriating, as the Postmaster-General agreed might be appropriated, $425,000, which would be the amount required for sea and inland postage, it only appropriated $375,000. That is distinctly refusing to pay the sea and inland postages.

Mr. BECK. I understand from the information I have that a subsequent estimate reduced it to $375,000, and now I am told by a gentleman who knows that to be the fact. It was reduced by a subsequent estimate down to the amount which the House appropriated. That includes the sea and inland postage.

Mr. President, the details I have gone over will, I hope, enable Senators to understand the question at issue; that is all I expected or desired to do when I rose. Liberal appropriations have been made by the House for mail service. The bill came here as clean as ever an appropriation bill came from one house to another; free of everything, except what the service required; and when, after a long struggle in both Houses, we had at last, by agreement, yielded the point that appropriation bills should no longer be encumbered with legislation for purposes outside of what was intended by the bill, and when the President of the United States in his annual message and the Postmaster-General in his report have protested against this subsidy being tacked on this bill, and when, under our own rules, we have no right to do more than appropriate to carry out existing laws, I am surprised that a proposition is now made not only to set aside existing law, but to give to ships of a certain character for five years rights that they have not now, and are clearly not entitled to, thus increasing the appropriation far beyond the demands of the head of the Department, and beyond what he says he can fairly use. I insist that it is not wise, in the face of all these facts, to throw into this bill such a fire-brand. The House of Representatives struggled with it before, if I may speak of what occurred in a Congress now dead. They struggled against it to the very last day of the last Congress; and it was only when an extra session of Congress was inevitable, unless it was agreed to, that they yielded; and when the money was so given the Postmaster-General, in a full report, stating fairly all his reasons and all the facts, many of which I have just read, shows that he can not execute it either wisely or beneficially, to renew it now in a form extending for five years, instead of applying the limitations to one year, as the present law did, is not only new legislation, but unwise legislation. I have no desire to discuss it further.

Mr. FRYE. May I call the Senator's attention to one thing?

Mr. BECK. Certainly, anything.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator two or three times, with a great deal of emphasis, has stated that the President of the United States and the Postmaster-General have indicated very decidedly their wishes in this regard, and that the administration itself would be a good deal disturbed in the execution of its duties if Congress should do this thing. I call his attention to the fact that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, by message, both of them, insisted that the coinage of the silver dollar should be stopped; and yet the Senator from Kentucky with infinitely greater emphasis then than now insisted in a very able speech, that was in demand all over the country, that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury were entirely wrong in advising Congress to stop the coinage of the silver dollar.

Mr. BECK. I did. That was a matter of public policy about which men may well differ, about which Democrats differ, about which Republicans differ. I think I have the support of quite a number of Republican gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber on that question. I know there are gentlemen on this side who do not. But that was not providing for the carrying on of the work of any Department of this Government. That was a matter that will come up fairly on a report from the Finance Committee, as this matter will come up fairly when the Committee on Commerce presents it. The Senator from Maine presented it last year, when he had his bill up to regulate commerce and relieve the burdens of ships. I discussed it then and will discuss it with him again if he likes; but now we are dealing with an annual appropriation bill to enable the Postmaster-General for the next fiscal year to carry on the machinery provided by law, and what my difference of opinion with the President or anybody else in regard to the wisdom or the unwisdom of stopping the coinage of the silver dollar has to do with a question of the administration of the Post-Office Department and making an appropriation for it for the next fiscal year I can not see. It will be perfectly proper for me to differ with the Senator from Maine when he brings up a bill to regulate commerce. He may insist on subsidizing ship-yards for the purpose of building ships on the Delaware or anywhere else in this country. I may think that is not the best plan. We may honestly differ. The President of the United States may for aught I know be opposed to-day to allowing our people to buy ships abroad. I think, as at present advised, that it would be the part of wisdom to allow them to do it. The Postmaster-General may think the same way. That has nothing to do with this question, nor am I any less a Democrat or the Senator any less a Republican because he differs from some of his Republican brethren, and I differ with some of my Democratic brethren about the silver question or other great public questions. I am with the President on this question. I think he is right on this proposition, and right on this labor question, though the Senator on yesterday sneered at his views on that subject.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the President condemn the policy, or did I understand that one of the grounds of complaint was that the amount appropriated last year was not sufficiently large?

Mr. BECK. In dealing with appropriations for the Post-Office Department I understand the President to insist that matters pertaining to trade and commerce can not legitimately be considered and fastened upon a Department whose duty it is to provide only for the carrying of the mails; and that any provision which seeks to limit the right of the Postmaster-General to any particular class of vessels is injudicious and injurious to the service, and that the money now asked to be appropriated is sought to be given for other purposes foreign to the mail service. That is what I gather from the President's message and the report of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. EUSTIS. I think that as far back as 1845, when the first steamship line was subsidized by this Government, that very question came up as to the Department of the Government that had charge of this subject; and after putting it under the charge of the Navy Department for several years, after the steam lines had been subsidized at different times, there was a report made to this body stating that that position which had been taken was a false position, and that the only correct position that could be taken was that taken by all other governments, and that was to transfer this service to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BECK. I have no document before me bearing upon that except one. The Hon. James Campbell was postmaster-General in 1856, and I have a portion of his report bearing upon that question, which reads thus:

By the act of the 3d of March, 1845, the Postmaster-General is authorized, under the restrictions and provisions of the existing laws, to contract for the transportation of the mails of the United States between any of the ports of the United States and a port or ports of any foreign power whenever, in his opinion, the public interest will thereby be promoted. It is made his duty to report to the next ensuing Congress a copy of each of these contracts, with a statement of the amount of postage derived under the same. These contracts must be made with citizens of the United States, the mail carried in American vessels by American citizens, and the contracts may be made for a term not exceeding ten years, and must contain stipulations reserving the right to the two Houses of Congress to terminate them at any time by a joint resolution. The power given by this act is one under which large expenditures involving millions could be created, but neither of my predecessors nor myself has ever used the authority thus given.

That was from 1845 to 1856.

Believing that Congress should reserve to itself the right to say to how many and to what foreign ports the mails of the United States should be transported, and the amount of money which should be expended for that purpose, I would recommend the repeal of so much of this act as confers this great power on the Postmaster-General.

For eleven years the power was not used, and Mr. Campbell recommended its repeal as a power that ought not to be lodged in the Postmaster-General.

Mr. EUSTIS. How have those contracts been made?

Mr. BECK. They have all been made under the postal service, and they have brought no increase of trade anywhere; they have brought nothing but scandal to everybody connected with them from the Pacific Mail, which stunk in the nostrils of all men as everybody knows who was then connected with it. The money only went into the pockets of a few men who raised a clamor about American ships and the flag as is being done now and a few lobbyists who hung around the doors of Congress to get it through. That has been the experience with all subsidies. Now the Department, the President, and all disinterested men who want to carry on the post-office business free from scandal and extraneous considerations desire to keep clear of a repetition of such things.

The Senator from Louisiana must see, he is too good a lawyer not to see, that this is an attempt to ingraft legislation on an appropriation bill and to impose it, not in the interest of the postal service, for another and a different purpose which the Postmaster-General ought not to be required to meddle with. I have not had the pleasure of reading the speech made on yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]; I see by the RECORD that it is withheld for revision; but in his speech as reported in the National Republican he made use of some remarks which indicate that his purpose at least as the manager of this bill is not looking to the carrying of letters in making this amendment nor to the postal service; he is in this indirect way seeking to build up and extend the commerce of the country. I read his language as reported in the Republican:

> The proposed amendment was intended as a step toward doing for American commerce with foreign countries what we had been doing for the internal commerce in the facilities for mail communication.
>
> Mr. BECK said his objection to the amendment was that it looked to crippling our postal facilities rather than advancing them. In our inland mail transportation we looked only to the question of getting the best service. We did not care whether the wagon in which it was carried was built in New Jersey or in Paris. This amendment sought to pay American ships, that might take twice as long to deliver the mails as other ships might take. Our laws took no cognizance of the place where our mail wagons were built.
> Mr. PLUMB cared a good deal where the wagons were built. He would have them all built in America. He would have every instrumentality of American ambition and effort made in America. Referring to our foreign commerce, Mr. PLUMB said we had given up the trade of Mexico to Germany and Great Britain. We had refused to meet half way the republics of South America, and even the colonies of Great Britain in the same direction.

He proceeded to show how we had squandered about a million and a half in the New Orleans Exposition, how we had thrown away money on the Eads jetties, how we were about to spend four or five million dollars more for the Mississippi River, how we were building libraries and doing a great many other things. I only desire to say to him that while he and I may differ as to the means he will not go one step further than I will in endeavoring to build up American commerce. I I will try to do it in the best way as I understand it. He and I obviously differ as to the best method. Both of us, living in the West, know the importance to our people of cheap transportation to foreign markets. Everybody understands that a ship is but a big wagon, an extension of a railway, a vehicle to haul commerce, and we all understand that the cheaper the exporter can buy that vehicle, whether it is in the form of a ship, a locomotive, or a railway car or any other means of conveyance, to get what is raised in the great countries from which he and I come the better it is for our people, because the wheat, the cattle, and the hogs of the West have to go to London or Liverpool, to Paris or Berlin, somewhere abroad to find a market. The man who buys in competition with others must always make this calculation: What will it cost to get the merchandise from Kansas or Kentucky to the seaboard; what will it cost to carry it from New York to Liverpool or London; what will be the commissions, the insurance, the interest, and what will be a reasonable profit? All these sums he has to take out of the foreign market price before he can know what the wheat, the hogs, or the cattle of our country are worth at home. We only get what remains after all charges are deducted. Therefore the cheaper transportation can be made the more our people get for their produce. If a ship to haul it over the ocean can be bought for $200,000 at one point that would cost $300,000 at another, there is just that much less expense to be deducted out of the price of the crops that have to be hauled by it.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Kentucky at that point whether he does not think it would be an element in the cheapening of the cost of transportation to shorten the haul to market, and therefore if it would not be better for the American farmer living in Kentucky and Kansas to have the man who makes his wagons and the man who makes his ships and the railroads and so on, live a little nearer to the point where he raises his grain that he has to ship so as to save him the cost of shipment to a foreign market?

Mr. BECK. I do; and if it were possible for that to be done I desire to see it done; but it is becoming more and more impossible every day. We occupy a continent greater and far more productive than all Europe. Congress has given away to railroads almost as much territory as there is in the thirteen States which secured American Independence, and we have given to every man in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America who is willing to take it, along those great lines, homesteads and pre-emptions of say 160 acres each, until we have induced more people to come from Europe in the last twelve years than there were human beings, Indians excepted, on this continent when John Adams was inaugurated as President of the United States.

Through the industry of these people, added to the industry, intelligence, and energy of our native population, whose increase has been almost marvelous, the capacity for production has become so great and the necessities for the hauling of freight by railroads and every other means of transportation has become so urgent and immense, and competition has made hauling so cheap that the agricultural products of this country are so enormous that fifty-six million people can not consume them, can not begin to consume them, they are obliged to go abroad. Instead of there being more men to feed, as productions increase the inventions for labor saving made every day in every branch of industry in this country by substituting machinery for human muscle are rapidly diminishing the number of mouths that formerly had to be fed from the products of the farms. The calculations now made by the best informed men is that in New England now in the great manufacturing establishments seven people are doing the work that thirty years ago it required seventy people to do, and this condition is not confined to manufactures or to the East. I have been on the prairies of the great West, in Dakota for instance, frequently in the last few years. I saw one hundred machines cutting wheat with self-binders attached, each one of those binders doing the work of six men, on one farm.

The self-binding attachment alone saved Mr. Dalrymple from hiring and feeding six hundred men every day. Machinery is doing the work now everywhere and in every business. The products of the farm have become so great, mainly by reason of the power of the machinery that is used, that they can not be consumed by the people at home, and the power of the manufacturing machinery of this country has become so great, being estimated as equal to all the human labor in the world, that there are not mouths enough required in the making of what all our people can use to consume anything like all the agricultural products we are compelled to produce. Hence it is that we are obliged to go abroad with our produce. Out of the six or seven hundred millions of exports that go every year to foreign countries all but about 16 per cent. are agricultural products. The wheat, the pork, the cattle, the provisions, the butter, everything that the farmer produces, goes, and the foreign-market price regulates the price not only of what goes there, but of the whole home product. The surplus is so great that we can not control our own market prices. Therefore we are compelled to send it abroad, and when we sell abroad we have to sell in competition with any so-called pauper in the world who offers the same thing in the same market. There can be no protection there, no protection on the high seas, no protection after the ships leave our shores.

That is the trouble with the theory of the Senator, and these conditions show clearly the distinction between a ship engaged in the foreign trade and instrumentalities used in domestic commerce. Yet we allow the farmer of the West to buy his wagon in London if he wants to; we allow the man who wants to buy a locomotive to run on an American railway to buy it anywhere abroad if he chooses. Perhaps half the machinery in New England now engaged in the production of highest quality of fine goods is English, French, or German made machinery; indeed, the argument which was made here why we should not reduce but increase the tariff on the highest classes of cotton goods was that they had to import their machinery in order to start what they called an infant industry. Whether I am right or not as to the quantity of machinery now imported, the fact remains that they have the right to import it. Nothing is prohibited but ships. Why they should be excepted I cannot understand when we have to compete on the high seas with all other nations, all of them using ships bought in the cheapest markets. If there is one thing above all others that our people ought to be allowed to obtain at the cheapest rate, it is a ship for the foreign trade.

The Senator from Kansas grew eloquent when he spoke about the flag. Mr. President, you might with as much propriety hoist the flag over your market-wagon as hoist it over your ship, if sentiment is to be indulged in. The ship is nothing but a freight or passenger wagon. The purchase of a ship is a private enterprise as much as the purchase of a locomotive; it is not an American public enterprise; it is when bought anywhere the private citizen's property just as the wagon is the private property of the man who buys it. There is no patriotism in the business. People engaged in private trade, taking all the risks themselves, are not considering questions of patriotism any more than a national banker when he discounts a note or when he contracts or expends the currency, or when he makes more money from the premium on his bonds by selling them than by taking circulation, is caring about the effect it has on the country. He does not buy or sell for patriotic purposes, he does what he thinks is best for himself, and always does what he thinks will put the most money in his pocket, no matter who else is helped or hurt.

So when a merchant starts his ship on the ocean he has to see to it that he gets it as cheap as his rival. He can not afford to be handicapped by being made to pay 50 per cent. more than his foreign competitor pays. Men trade, buy, and sell to make money. All the Government can do is to see that our own citizens have an equal chance with other people. If General Lee, who I suppose was the best beloved man by the people of the South of any man who lived since the war or during it, had tried to sell goods in the city of Richmond or New Orleans, and General Butler, who did not have much affection especially from the women of those cities, had started a store next door to him, and had sold his calicoes half a cent a yard cheaper than General Lee, every woman in either city would have gone to General Butler's store to buy their goods, and they would have been right. That is business. Self-interest is what regulates all these things.

There is nothing practical in sentiment about the flag. We have treaties with England, Germany, France, Italy, Sweden, Norway, I believe almost every nation except Spain, which contains substantially this provision:

No other or higher rate of duties shall be imposed or collected on vessels of Prussia—

This applies to all vessels of foreign governments—or her dominions whencesoever coming, nor on their cargoes, howsoever composed, than is or may be payable on vessels of the United States and their cargoes.

So that Congress can not give our ships any advantage even in our own trade, no more tonnage-tax, no more tax on goods imported, no other burdens can be imposed upon any foreign ship, or its cargo, than we impose upon our own. We have placed every foreigner on perfect equality with our own people, and yet every one of the people of those nations with whom we have treaties buy their ships where they can buy them cheapest, and they are protected by the flags of their several nationalities. The Frenchman is as proud of his flag as the Senator from Kansas is of ours; so is the Italian; so is the German; but their pride in their flag never induces them to buy a ship at $300,000 to come in competition with a man who has a ship exactly similar to his that cost him $200,000. He buys ships as he does goods, where he can buy them cheapest, and he enters into our trade and drives our people out of it. The result has been that since 1856–'60, when American ships had from 80 to 84 per cent. of our carrying trade and we were getting, up to 1860, about $25,000,000 from profits made and the trade of other nations, we are now reduced to 15 per cent., or 14.60, to be exact, instead of 80.84, and we are paying to foreign nations $150,000,000 a year to do our hauling, all of which we ought to do ourselves; and all this nonsense is kept up by law for fear some pet of Congress will not get a chance to build a ship somewhere in this country. It is well known that but for the monopoly of the coastwise trade, into which none but American-built ships can enter, not half of the few now constructed here would be built; we do not build enough to furnish a single steamship from the great port of New York to cross the Atlantic, with all the great commerce that is carried on from our own metropolis.

Is there any wisdom in that sort of legislation? We allow all other nations the right to trade and carry on terms of absolute equality with our own people, knowing that they buy their ships wherever they please in the cheapest market, and yet we deprive our own citizens of the same right; we force our people out of the trade or compel them to compete with others handicapped to death. As I said on a former occasion, it would be as absurd for a Kentucky horseman, because his grandfather made his three-year-old colt carry 130 pounds, to put him on the race track against a competitor running a colt of the same age carrying 70 pounds and expect him to win, as to handicap ourselves by saying that we alone of all the people engaged in trade shall not be allowed to buy a cheap ship with which to compete with all the citizens of other countries, after giving them the right to trade here on equal terms with our own people, knowing, as Congress does, that they all buy ships where they please as cheap as they can. That dog-in-the-manger policy is what has driven us from the sea, and all the little nibbles about postage subsidies to this man or that man or the other man as a proposition to build up commerce by bounties and gifts, which seem to be relied on by the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Maine, are to my mind worse than useless; not as good as "brown-bread pills" to fever patients.

When this bill was argued before, the same suggestions were made that are made now, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] replied that they were "insectivorous compared to the deadly blight which had stricken down the merchant marine of the United States." The Senator from Kansas pleads for protection; he is too intelligent not to know that the moment we admit that we need protection we admit that we can not sell our products abroad. Nothing can be sold abroad that requires protection at home from foreign competition. The very object of protection is to prevent other people from coming here and competing with us. With our machinery all agree that we can manufacture of everything in six months all that the people of this country can consume in twelve. What we now need is more extended markets; what we want is to get abroad with our goods. We can only get there in the cheapest ships. Protection does not protect us any longer. The wall is as high on one side as it is on the other; and when the Senator from Kansas says we ought to raise it and keep our goods at home and make all we need here, the trouble is that with the powerful machinery we have and the immense country that we inhabit and the great agricultural productions that we are obliged to produce every year, it is impossible for us to keep our men employed and raise or dispose of the products we are obliged to raise, and sell and have our people prosper. We can no longer prosper if we only swap products among ourselves.

There are one billion five hundred million people in this world. We have fifty-five million of them. Our manufactures never go abroad to any extent. The Senator from Maine referred to some little things we had produced that were getting out. They do not amount to a bagatelle when our capacity to produce and manufacture are considered. Less than 10 per cent. of our exports are manufactured goods. Of the products of our great woolen industries nothing goes abroad unless it be something on the Mexican line or on the Canadian border.

We never can be the great and prosperous people our resources entitle us to become, we never shall be developed to anything like the full extent of our capacity, until we abandon the policy of manufacturing only for our own people, charging them double prices, under Congressional dictation. We can only manufacture for the world when we can go to other countries and sell as cheaply as other people sell. Our farmers have to do that now. They are compelled to sell in the cheapest markets, and they ought to be allowed to buy the cheapest machinery and means of transportation, the cheapest wagons, the cheapest lines of railway, the cheapest ocean freight-carrying ships possible, in order to give them a living chance in the competition with others.

I read last night the report of the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce. It contains a great deal of edifying matter and shows where we are drifting and how our farmers are going down. Let me read a sentence or two from it. On page 25, under the head of "Relations of Internal and External Commerce to Agriculture," the committee proceed to say that while for many years up to 1874 we imported more than we exported, yet from 1875 to 1884 we had exported more than we imported $1,360,480,467. Our exports are increasing every day. Thirty years ago we had 6,000 miles of railroad; now we have 121,000 miles. A few years ago we exported fifteen or twenty million bushels of wheat, and now we are exporting nearly 100,000,000 bushels; and this condition of things has come about by the rapid development of the country, especially of the West, where there is and can be no protection to the agricultural interests at least.

The excess of wheat-growing—

Says Mr. J. R. Dodge, the Statistician of the Agricultural Department, quoted by the committee—

The excess of wheat-growing has brought prices to a ruinous point, when sound grain can be bought in Dakota for 40 cents, and again, in London for $1. It is down close to India rates.

* * * * * * *

It is true that our production has advanced with wonderful strides. While population doubled in twenty-seven years the wheat area doubled in fifteen; there were four million farms in 1880 and but two million in 1860. The maize crop of one year is equal to the product of four years in Europe. The supply of wheat per capita was only 4.33 bushels in 1849, 5.5 in 1859, 7.46 in 1869, and 9.2 in 1879. We might produce 20 bushels per capita, but it would be folly to do it. The area in wheat is now 38,500,000 acres, and 12,000,000 acres are cultivated in excess of the wants of the country, the produce of which must be sold abroad, mainly in Liverpool, in competition with the grain of Russia, of South America, of Australia, and of India. It is sent 1,500 miles by land and 3,500 miles by sea, and from California more than half round the world, to compete with the half-civilized fellahs of Egypt and the slavish ryots of India. It is a competition unworthy of American freemen, and utterly unnecessary, being caused by bad calculation in the distribution of crop areas.

There it is. "Stop!" say the protectionists, "do not compete with paupers; raise only what will feed the manufacturers at home." Manufacturers for whom? For the world? No; but manufacturers for our own people, who are told to quit raising wheat with which alone they can pay for the clothes that cover their backs; and when they do buy from manufacturers at home they are required by law to pay 75 per cent. more for every blanket and every particle of woolen goods that the poor man wears than any so-called pauper in Europe pays for like articles; and an average of 46 per cent. upon everything that a man eats, drinks, wears, or smells. The committee go on, after giving a good deal more of the same sort of advice, and say:

So the outlook is not good for the United States to ship breadstuffs in unlimited quantities throughout the civilized world, and the principal markets, both for bread and meat, must henceforth be sought at home.

Sought at home! We were told yesterday, jumping from one thing to another, and I believe we were told it in absolute good faith, because the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] believes everything he says, and his statement will go to the country as a fact—

We imported last year from Great Britain $37,000,000 worth of cotton goods, and we raised the cotton here. Every single dollar's worth of those thirty-seven millions could just as well have been made in the United States of America as in Europe, and if they had been one hundred thousand of these men out of work would not have been idle.

In 1883 you forced us to reduce the duties on those goods from 16 to 33 per per cent., and an increased importation followed.

That last statement amazed me.

He stated how much we had reduced the tariff on woolen goods, and how much on other goods. I confess I was astonished. I thought I knew that could not be true. I turned to the tables in the official reports, and I found that instead of there being a reduction on these goods, Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, whose duty it was to advise Congress in regard to these matters, on the 10th of March, 1884, furnished a table in which he showed that under the old tariff the average ad valorem on all manufactures of cotton was 37 per cent., and under the tariff of 1883, by which the Senator said we reduced from 16 to 33 per cent., it was about 40 per cent., an increase of 24.06 per cent.; and in regard to woolen goods, which under the tariff before March, 1883, was 66 per cent., it was increased to 68 per cent., or an increase of 2.17 per cent. I then turned, for fear there might have been a change since that time, to the report of the Bureau of Statistics that was sent to us the other day in regard to imported merchandise, and I found that the average duties on cotton goods, that the Senator from Maine said had been reduced from 16 to 30 per cent., were higher now than they had been since 1867. The only cotton goods that were reduced were articles that were not manufactured in New England, but articles that were manufactured in the Southern States. An increase is made on the finer goods, such as knit stockings, hose, lace, and all that character of goods which New England considered as yet an infant industry of hers.

The average is 40 per cent. ad valorem on all that class of goods and upon laces, insertions, trimmings, on the largest importations of which we are now paying 40 per cent. ad valorem, the average being 46 per cent. on everything dutiable and 40 per cent. on all cotton goods. Let me state here a remarkable fact: The great mass of the people in the Southern States had been trampled under foot first by war, then by reconstruction, all their labor was demoralized, yet they had to compete under absolute free trade with New England in the manufacture of cotton goods. That industry in the East had been built up for more than forty years by all the protection that tariffs could give it, with the best machinery, with men competent to manage almost twice as many spindles as the negro or untrained man of the South could operate, yet the Southern people, because the raw materials were closer to them, because the climate was better, because they did not have to lay up so much for hard winters, and because of many other conditions favorable to them, those people in the South thus demoralized in their labor, thus unprotected, with absolute free trade between New England and Georgia, have built up their cotton-mills until the New England people do not care now what tariff there is on coarser cottons. The South has taken that trade from them by fair, free competition. Perhaps to that extent the statement of the Senator from Maine may have been correct. There may have been heavy reductions in that class of goods, but upon the average of cotton goods the increase was 2½ per cent. under the last tariff instead of a reduction of 16 to 33 per cent., as the Senator stated yesterday.

Mr. FRYE. Has not the Senator heard that explained in the Senate several times, that the increased ad valorem was caused by reason of the decrease in the price of the goods?

Mr. BECK. Perhaps.

Mr. FRYE. Is it not so? The Arkwright Club is my authority for my statement. That is the largest cotton manufacturing club there is in the United States, and it is composed of men who know what they are talking about.

Mr. BECK. Yes; but if the Senator will turn to United States statutes and observe the increased rates imposed, I believe, in the conference committee, he will find the tax increased regardless of the present price on cotton laces and other fancy articles of cotton; they were increased by the last tariff law.

Mr. FRYE. The duty certainly was not increased on lace.

Mr. BECK. The paragraph will show for itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was not increased on lace in the conference committee.

Mr. BECK. It was increased. Certainly it was not reduced, and the statement that any reduction was made is incorrect.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether or not the duties on cotton goods were lowered?

Mr. ALDRICH. The duties on the large majority of cotton goods produced here were largely reduced.

Mr. BECK. On some imported goods; but on the average of the imports they were increased 2½ per cent. That was officially shown the first year after the act was passed; therefor the Senator's statement was all wrong.

Mr. FRYE. The limitations were on fine goods.

Mr. BECK. Of course; and that is what the friends of the Senator from Maine desired. They would not have complained if the imports had been of goods that competed with the people down South.

Mr. FRYE. Instead of increasing any duty, the constant purpose of the Democratic party is to decrease duty. I say the duties on fine goods should be so far increased that we should manufacture every yard of that cotton cloth and lace at home.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine is consistent, I admit. This is his language in regard to the tariff in 1882:

> And yet, sir, right in the teeth of these savage denunciations—
>
> Speaking of the Democratic party against a protective tariff—
> fidelity to truth compels me to declare that I am a protectionist from principle. If there was no public debt, no interest to pay, no pension-list, no army and no navy to support, I still should oppose free trade and its twin sister, tariff for revenue only, and favor protective duties.

He would put money into the pockets of the men that had the power to control the machinery and the labor of this country; he would compel the men who raise wheat in Dakota at 60 cents a bushel and have to sell it in competition with the poorest pauper from Russia when he gets to the foreign market to buy his goods at such prices as New England manufacturers might demand—he would compel him to buy a ship at $300,000 that he could buy elsewhere at $200,000, and would not allow him to take the money that he got for the wheat, that he thus sold in competition with pauper labor, to buy clothes for himself and his wife and children where he sold his products and could buy what he needed at reasonable prices; he would make him bring his money here and pay to some New England manufacturer 75 or 100 per cent. more than he had been asked abroad for the same things. If there was no interest on the public debt, no army, no navy, no revenue to collect, the man who has to sell abroad must be compelled to pay people here whatever they demand for the articles they had to sell. That is the logic of the Senator's position. That is his idea of protecting American industry.

I should like to know why the man in Dakota who sells wheat in Europe and has to take it abroad to find a market, why the man in the South whose cotton has to go to Liverpool, why the men who send petroleum, cattle, hogs, and everything to the markets of the world and must sell in competition with anybody and everybody, if this Government does not need the money, should not be allowed to take the money thus obtained from the products of his honest industry and buy in the cheapest market what he needs, having been compelled to sell in the cheapest market that which he produces.

No, says the Senator from Maine, I would not allow them to do it. Mr. President, protection does not protect the farmer; protection does not protect the producer of goods that must be sold abroad; protection does not protect the laborer, because the very moment the manufacturing establishments that can and do make in six months all that this country can consume in a year, and refuse to compete for foreign trade, and refuse to manufacture at rates that other people manufacture for, who refuse to sell to Mexico, Central America, and the countries of South America, in regard to which there is now so much talk of having trade with, when they manufacture as much as we can consume at home they encourage strikes, they reduce wages, the laborers protest, the manufacturers close the doors, and are glad to close them, and produce no more until the necessities of consumption require the surplus stock they have on hand to be purchased at their price. In the mean time their laborers starve, and they are told "you must not compete with paupers." We are pauperized by this system of protection, and the laborers who are made to believe that they are working for their own benefit are driven into enforced idleness often for half the year. There is no end to the cunning of wealth and greed combined. The laborer is compelled to strike, the manufacturer closes the mill and waits for a rise in the market in order to sell his goods, while that laborer and his family are starving, all to keep up the wages of labor. It was only the other day that I saw an account of a meeting held somewhere in or near Philadelphia, among the producers of coal. They agreed to curtail the production of that article and produce only half as much, so as to sell it for more. What did that mean? Diminished production to one-half and starvation to the laborers employed in order to put money into the pockets of the employers. But let me return to the statement of the Senator from Maine in regard to the last tariff law.

When you examine the tariff on woolen goods about which the Senator from Maine spoke yesterday, I hope gentlemen will investigate the figures carefully. The average rate of duty is about 70 per cent. now, yet the protectionists want more. Oliver Twist was not more importunate in his cry than they are.

In every instance the highest priced article is always taxed more lightly than the poorest and cheapest. The heaviest burden falls upon the poor, while it is lightened for the rich. Examine the returns on page 100 of the annual report on imported merchandise: Woolen shawls, valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound, average ad valorem rate of duty 86.23 per cent.; woolen shawls valued at above 80 cents per pound, 59.51 per cent.; all manufactures of every description not specially enumerated or provided for made wholly or in part of wool, embracing all the cheapest, valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 93.87 per cent.; all goods valued above 80 cents per pound, 62.72 per cent.—31 per cent. less tax on the goods that the rich men wear than on the same woolen articles that the poor are compelled to buy. That is true all through this system of tariff taxation which is lauded by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kansas as being a system much to be desired.

Senators, we may talk about mails; may parade trifles, and magnify the supposed benefits which subsidies can bring; we may have money in the Treasury which ought to be got rid of, and that is one of the troubles of an overburdened treasury, especially when gentlemen on the other side want to make it appear that Democrats are more extravagant than they were by giving away as much money as possible and how much more we give away than they did when they were in power. That will be very pleasing for them in the campaign next fall. That is about all the service it will render anybody, I think, if we are foolish enough to do it.

We may give away what we please to carry mails, but until we do something to take off the burdens from labor and widen its fields of operation, until we do something to extend markets, we will have no real permanent prosperity in any branch of the industries in this country. The farmer is as much a laborer and the farm workman is as much a laborer as the man who works in an iron foundry or a woolen mill. More than half our people are engaged in agricultural industries. The taxation on woolens which I have just called attention to is 33 per cent. less than upon high-priced woolen goods than on the cheaper. There is 25 per cent. less taxation imposed upon shawls and other things that the rich can buy than on what the poor must purchase. This no man can defend. The whole system of taxation is so adjusted that it falls upon labor and bears oppressively upon labor alone.

The bonds of the United States are exempted from all taxation; they are safe. A man may own a million or ten million dollars of bonds of the United States and not pay a dollar either to the State or Federal Government. He can drive his carriage with his liveried servants over the roads his poorer neighbors have built. He pays nothing for churches, schools, or for anything else. He is exempt from all burdens. So far as the United States is concerned the richest man in America, if he has no family, does not pay as much as his carriage driver if he has half a dozen children to feed and clothe. All taxation is adjusted so as to exempt wealth and bear with grinding force upon the labor of the country; all our taxes are so adjusted that there is no way of sending our manufactured articles abroad, and we can manufacture, as I have said, in six months all our people can consume in twelve.

The Senator from Kansas said on yesterday that we had surrendered our legitimate trade with Mexico and Central America to France, England, and Germany. How and why are we doing it? We are doing it because we can not or will not manufacture and sell our goods as cheaply as those countries are manufacturing and selling theirs and sending them to Mexico and elsewhere, and with the exception of silver there is nothing Mexico has that we will allow to enter our ports in payment for what she takes from us. That is where our trouble is.

Mr. PLUMB. If you will persuade your Democratic House of Representatives to do their part in carrying out the treaty we made some time ago perhaps you will change your mind about that.

Mr. BECK. I do not know that I have any persuasive power over the House of Representatives, nor do I know what they propose to do. I know this, speaking for myself, that no treaty ever has been or ever can be proposed to liberalize trade with Mexico that I am not in favor of. I regard it of the highest importance that we should control the trade of that great country, and the trade of all Central America and South America as well. We ought to have a fair share of the trade of China, Japan, Congo, of all the less civilized or less advanced countries, because in that line our prosperity lies.

With Mexico we ought to have the most intimate relations. I do not know that I can tell how I voted, but I can say that the good-will of that country, the peace along the border for a thousand miles from the Rio Grande to the Pacific, the good neighborhood that exists, and the harmony we have as compared with the disturbance that would exist if good relations did not prevail, settles that question with me. Mexico is poor, somewhat dependent, sore because of the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo whereby we dismembered her of her most valuable provinces. All this requires us to treat her kindly. We have either to take control of that country or surrender it to France, England, or Germany. I agree that the more intimate our relations can be made with Mexico the better for us, and we ought to pull down every barrier that we possibly can to bring her under the influence of this great Republic.

The Senator said yesterday that we had thrown away a million and a half at the New Orleans Exposition. We did, if you like that form of expression. I voted for it. I believe he did. I do not think we will ever get a dollar back. I do not care whether we do or not. I went to see that grand exposition. I saw the Mexican exhibit. I saw the people of Mexico side by side with ours. They were surprised to find what good neighborhood could exist and how many things Mexico produced that we wanted and how much better people they were than their neighbors had supposed them to be. I saw developments produced by Arkansas, especially in the production of fruits, that amazed the men of Massachusetts and of the Northwest as to the capacity of that great region. In short, I saw enough at that exposition in the week or two I was there to satisfy me that the million and a half was well-spent money if we never get a dollar of it back.

So that as far as I am concerned I will go as far as the Senator from Kansas in doing anything to foster that trade, but I believe the only way to build it up, and I believe it can not be done in any other way, is to pull down the bars and change our system of taxation. England kept up the system we are maintaining now for centuries and went down, down, down, year by year until her people were starving. All at once she reversed her policy; she gave her people cheap food, she gave them the right to bring in cheap raw materials, she opened her great manufacturing establishments, she removed the taxes from them, she told her people to stand on their muscle and their manhood, and from that day on there has been progress and prosperity until now she is doing 62 per cent. of the carrying trade of the world. While she has dull times now, and every country has its temporary drawbacks, she ought not to have anything like the commerce and the trade we would have if we should pursue a more liberal policy.

But we have to manufacture for the world, not for ourselves alone. We have to send our goods to Mexico; we have to send them to Central America and South America, to Africa, to China, to Japan, and we have to take what they have in exchange; without that we are making no progress. Two ships may start from the capes of the Delaware or the Gulf of Mexico, one from England and the other from the United States, costing exactly the same, with the same character of goods taken to the Argentine Republic, of which so much was said yesterday, or to Chili; they may offer them at the same prices; the Englishman will sell his goods at once and the American can not sell his. Why? Because those people have no money; but they have copper, they have wool, they have everything that the Englishman wants, and he swaps. He exchanges his goods for their goods; both are benefited; he loads his vessel and goes home, telegraphing ahead "there is a load of iron, copper, wool, or anything on the way," and anybody who has a manufacturing establishment buys it if he wants it. We can not land anything of that sort in this country without paying 46 per cent.; therefore we can not trade with other people. That is what has driven us out of the markets of the world. Mails and letters are of no use when obstacles of that sort are interposed.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to ask the Senator would it be any particular benefit to us to go to the Argentine Republic and bring their copper here when we have enough of it here ourselves, or to bring their wool here if we have enough of it here ourselves? If we can furnish our copper on our own soil would it not be money thrown away to buy it and bring it in from abroad?

Mr. BECK. I am amazed to hear that after the speech we heard yesterday from the Senator from Maine that we had brought in millions of dollars' worth of the product of wool from other countries.

Mr. DAWES. Did the Senator from Maine suggest that it was any profit to anybody to go a distance of a thousand miles for a thing which you have right at your own door?

Mr. BECK. Will anybody propose to buy anything that he can get at home for less money?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator says that England profits by going to Rio Janeiro or going to the Argentine Republic for wool and copper that she wants. If we do not go there for them it is because we have got them here.

Mr. BECK. I may not have made myself understood. We have, as I said, a cargo of manufactured goods, say cotton goods, and an English ship has a cargo of cotton goods; they are exactly alike, and cost the same. We take them to the Argentine Republic. We do not want money, and they have none to pay with. We want something to work with, do we not? England does the same thing. Now, everything that the Argentine Republic has got England takes and carries home. We may want exactly the same things.

I do not say we always want exactly the same things, but we may. Suppose we do. Suppose a man carrying a ship-load of American goods wants the same goods as the Englishman; the Englishman can afford to take them and the American can not. Why? Because the Englishman takes them home. It costs nothing to land them in England, whereas the American can not bring them here without paying at least 46 per cent. to land them. Therein lies the difference in the capacity to trade and obtain return cargoes, which is an important consideration.

Mr. DAWES. Both England and the United States want the same things, and England and the United States have precisely the same facilities for carrying them. Then, if England can buy in the Argentine Republic and our men can buy away from her, it is because England can sell her manufactures there cheaper than we can.

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. DAWES. And if England can sell her manufactures there cheaper than we can, the raw material being the same, it is because we pay more for making it up than she does.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no. I admitted for the sake of presenting the case fairly that they had cost the same. England can take what she swaps for hers home, and land them at home and convert them into new manufactures without paying a tax of a penny; we can not without paying half what they cost for the privilege of landing them.

Mr. DAWES. Why can she do it?

Mr. BECK. Because her people have not got to pay a tariff tax for landing them.

Mr. DAWES. Landing them where?

Mr. BECK. Landing them in England, when we want to land them in the port of New York, a tax of 46 per cent. average is demanded before we can land them.

Mr. DAWES. Tell me a single article of raw material that we can not produce at home that every one of us who believes in protection will not put upon the free-list to-day?

Mr. BECK. My dear friend, I do not know what any of you who want protection would put on the free-list.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. We brought last year from Rio de Janerio $50,000,000 worth of coffee.

Mr. BECK. All coffee?

Mr. FRYE. And we only sent $8,000,000 worth of manufactured goods back to Rio. That was free entirely. That coffee is free.

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. FRYE. What becomes then of the Senator's argument, and why did we not pay for it in manufactured goods?

Mr. BECK. I can tell you why. I insist and have insisted all through my argument the reason why we can not manufacture as cheaply as anybody else, and the demand for protection admits that fact, and therefore England and nearly every other country manufactures more cheaply than we can, and thereby gets the trade; but I went a step further in my illustration just now, and proposed to admit—what I know is not true, and every other gentleman knows is not true—that we manufacture certain articles just as cheaply as England does, and start them side by side with her to any place other than where we are buying goods on which no duty is imposed; send them to the Argentine Republic; send them to Mexico; send them anywhere, and we can not take what the people of those countries have to sell or swap, and of the countries we are seeking to trade with nine-tenths have no money. They have things that we want and that England wants and that every manufacturing country wants, and England can take them, because she can land them at home, and we can not take them, because we can not afford to pay the 46 per cent. for landing them and manufacture the material taken so as to sell it again in competition with a free-trade or low-tax competitor.

Mr. FRYE. Why does not the Senator take Rio de Janeiro as an illustration?

Mr. BECK. I repeat that we can not manufacture as cheaply as the people of countries who live under a low-tax or tariff system.

Mr. FRYE. We can manufacture the goods they use. The fact is that in Atlanta, Ga., they manufacture jeans of common qualities such as those people use as cheap as they are manufactured in this world.

Mr. BECK. Very well; they will then very soon build up a trade.

Mr. FRYE. They will if they have a steamship line between here and South America.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, there never was anybody's goods that could not get to market for want of a vehicle to haul them. The little postage it is now proposed to give has nothing to do with the cheapness of goods. Let anybody announce that there are goods in Liverpool, New York, Baltimore, or anywhere else for Rio de Janeiro, and some ocean tramp will be there the next morning as soon as the telegraph announces that the goods are ready. The mere wagon that hauls them has nothing to do with it, but the cheapness of the goods it hauls. The fact is there are now more ships in the world than there is freight to carry.

Mr. FRYE. I want to ask the Senator a question. England seems to be a model——

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; but England has done wonderfully well in the last forty years.

Mr. FRYE. Why is it that Great Britain pays to-day for carrying the mails to Central and South America twenty times as much as you pay for carrying your mails? Why is it that she pays $400,000 for carrying mails to the West India Islands and you pay $1,000?

Mr. BECK. The people of the United States pay for the carrying of their mails three times as much as England does in the aggregate. The difference is this, we pay our railroads and stages so as to reach our people now spread over a great continent. Fifty million dollars is the expenditure this year of our Post-Office Department.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, and on an average she pays 30 cents a mile, and you refuse to pay a steamship to South America over 3 cents a mile.

Mr. BECK. I refuse under the pretense of doing one thing to do another. I know it is not mail-carriage in my estimation, and I do not propose by indirection to be subsidizing under the pretense that we are carrying a mail. I do not say anybody else feels that way, but that is the way I feel about it, and that is the reason I do not propose to do it.

Mr. DAWES. May I put another question?

Mr. BECK. Not just now; I want to say that our mails cost us nearly three times as much as England's. England carries hers by steamboats, we carry mainly by railroad cars. Why? Because our people inhabit a great continent; she is a little island.

England, Scotland, and Ireland all combined have only 121,000 square miles. Texas alone has 276,000 square miles, more than twice as large. We have to reach our people by rail; by star routes; by inland and coastwise sea service; but we reach them no matter whether they are in Alaska or in the other remote Territories. England pursues the same policy; small as she is, her empire extends over all the earth. She has islands in the West Indies. She has Bermuda on one side of us and Halifax at the other. She has possessions everywhere; she reaches all her people. She has over twelve thousand commercial stations in all parts of the globe, with agents engaged in building up her great trade, informing her merchants, and seeking to increase their business. She sends mails and other communications everywhere. You can not go to any port in the known world where you will not find an English agent, an English blacksmith shop, an English coaling station, an English something to build up business. Of course she sends her mails and pays for them as liberally as we do. Because she sends by sea, as she is compelled to do, and we send by rail, as we are compelled to do to reach our people in all our Territories, the cry is now raised that England is paying more than we are for steamship lines, yet we are paying $3 to her one over the railroad lines, the necessities of the case settling the question. Each country does what its necessities require it do. She has to pay by the routes that reach her people; we pay by the lines that reach our people; neither subsidizes and neither is taxing its people for the purpose of putting money in any private man's pocket.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. I inquired of the Senator a little while ago what benefit it would be to go off to a foreign country for a raw material that is upon our own soil; now I should like to ask him this question: What benefit would it be to go to a foreign country for a manufactured article that we can manufacture at our own door? Is not the difference in the cost of going there for it all lost to somebody?

Mr. BECK. If it is manufactured at the same price at home it would be absurd to go abroad to buy it; but if I sell a thousand dollars' worth of wheat in Liverpool that I have raised and have received a thousand dollars therefor, and I am offered as many clothes, as much machinery, or whatever I must have, for that thousand dollars in Liverpool as I can buy in Massachusetts for $1,600, I should like to know what right anybody in Massachusetts has by law to prevent me from getting as much in Liverpool, where I sold my wheat, for a thousand dollars as any Massachusetts man will sell me for $1,600.

Mr. DAWES. One thing at a time.

Mr. BECK. Dispose of that one thing now.

Mr. DAWES. Not till we get at the other. We will have the other answered first. We want to get the thing as cheap at home, and what is the reason we can not get it as cheap at home? Because we pay more for the labor bestowed upon it here at home; and it is at the expense of the laborer that you go to foreign countries for that which is manufactured at home.

Mr. BECK. One moment on that subject. England to-day is paying 40 per cent. more than France for her labor. She is paying 50 per cent. more than Belgium. She is paying nearly 50 per cent. more than Germany, and yet she is driving them all out of competition.

Mr. DAWES. How much more than we are?

Mr. BECK. Not so much as we are, but paying next to us of any other country; for some things she is paying more than we do. Intelligent labor is always the cheapest labor. For the labor of the man who drives one of the machines of Mr. Dalrymple on his great Dakota farm he can better afford to pay $10 a day than he could to pay the foreign wages to ten, fifteen, or twenty ordinary, ignorant laborers using a scythe or sickle that is still used in many countries to perform that work. It is the product of the labor that determines the question whether the labor is cheap or dear, and the intelligence that produces the largest results is the cheapest labor, no matter what the price paid may be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, if I may interrupt my friend——

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly the labor that does any good to the body of the people of the United States or of Great Britain is that labor which brings bread and comfort to the mass of the laboring people. Now, does the Senator mean to say that in England and in Scotland the pay of the laborer is equal in its results—I mean in the comforts and happiness that it brings to him—to that in the United States?

Mr. BECK. I am not prepared to say that it is on the average. It ought not to be in an old and densely crowded country, governed, I was about to say, by an aristocracy, but I suppose it is better to say a monarchy, that people have come to the point of asserting their rights after years of oppression, they have not the same opportunities that men have on a great continent like this. But that the wages and the comforts of the laborers have doubled in England since that government reversed the system we are now pursuing and adopted the policy they have since adopted is known to all men. Since 1846 the wages of English laborers have doubled, the purchasing-power of their wages has doubled, their comforts in every regard have doubled, and while they are not equal to ours, and can not be expected to be, they are superior to those of any other country, and their laborers infinitely better off than they were when the policy of protection and exclusion prevailed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and if the Senator will allow me, that is all very good, and I am very glad it is so; but the question with us is how we can best promote the interests of the laboring men of the United States, which include my friend from Kentucky and myself in that definition. The Senator from Kentucky can not fail to know that at this present day and in this present year in England and in Scotland and Wales and Ireland, still worse, poor thing, the price that the laborers get for their work—and by laborers I include everybody below lawyers and doctors and priests—is not one-half what the laborers of the United States get all over this Union, and does not bring to them the positive results of a comfortable house, of good food, and everything that goes to promote the welfare and prosperity of a man and his family, that our people have.

I was up in Scotland last year, Mr. President, and I stopped at an inn, and the innkeeper, it being a place of resort on a salmon river, was building an addition to his house of stone, and he had a half-dozen stonecutters there cutting the pilasters and lintels, or whatever the technical name is, of the windows and doorways that were to furnish a part of this house; and there they were at work chipping away. I went in company with a Democrat to talk with them, and I asked them how they were getting on and what wages they got, and so on.

I asked the landlord the same, and they agreed. The stone-cutters, who are out here on the side of this Capitol, are getting $3 or $4 a day and are living in comfortable houses and having fresh meat every morning and fresh butter—unless it is oleomargarine and they are cheated—told me they were getting $1.05 a day, turned into our currency.

About one-third of what the same skillful and intelligent men in this country get, these skillful and intelligent Scotchmen were getting, and in the ultimate result of the houses that they lived in, of the food that they had, and of the comforts that they had for themselves and their families, all stood in the same proportion. What is the reason? Is it because, as the Senator from Kentucky supposes, that we have got a very bad tariff and all that sort of thing; or is it because of the American system that a Kentuckian, who lived before the days of my friend, that I in my boyish days had and still have the greatest admiration for, believed, in an American system that will give in America labor and employment to every man to help himself and his brother; or is it because of the English system of what is called free trade?

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am as anxious as any Senator here to promote the interest of the laboring man of this country, and I believe as earnestly that the principles I advocate are best for the American people and the success of this great Republic as the Senator from Vermont believes in his idea that protection aids them. I believe that the strikers, the idlers, the men now out of employment who are wondering what is the matter in this land of abundance, are in the bad condition they are now because of this miserable protective system that has prevented us from producing any manufactured articles to sell to any other people than ourselves; that system has narrowed the market until even the machinery has to stand still.

Few men are required to work it now in proportion to what were required thirty years ago, the proportion being, as I said before, 7 now as against 70 thirty years ago; then protection protected men, now it protects machinery; it is because the gentlemen—machine-owners—having been enriched by law, having by lobbying put bills through Congress to put money in their pockets, having imported machinery wherever they could drive out human labor by it, having hired the cheapest labor they could find in Europe or America—and there is no protection to any American laborers against hiring a Canadian at half price or bringing men here from any country in the world and working them at the lowest wages, and there is not one of these machine-owners, not the most patriotic among them, that would not discharge an American laborer and turn his wife and children out of doors to-morrow if he could get a man from Hungary, from Canada, from Italy, from anywhere, who could work for 5 cents a day cheaper than he would, there is no protection for that laboring man against pauper competition.

The laboring man's only protection is to require that the products of his labor shall be manufactured upon such a basis and on so large a scale that they can be sent all over the world, that one billion five hundred million people shall be the customers for his work instead of fifty-five million; until that is done we shall have strikes oft repeated even on this great continent. From 1873 to 1878 this land was full of tramps. We all know the circumstances that brought them to that condition then. I saw many of those homeless laborers in their wanderings. I have been to the Northwest many a time since.

What was then apparently a great calamity turned out to be a blessing in disguise. They settled upon the wheat lands of Dakota and Minnesota, Montana and elsewhere, and driven as they were from employment because the shops were shut up and they were apparently on the verge of starvation they took advantage of the bounty of the Government through the homestead and pre-emption laws, and many of the men who fled from closed factories, as well as those who came from Ireland, Germany, and elsewhere settled on those lands and became rich and prosperous in spite of protection; they became rich because of the adversity that our protection to slaves in the form of machines had brought upon them.

If protection is so beneficial, why are so many thousands of men idle in this country to-day? If protection protects on a great continent like this, why are our laboring people now so discontented? In a little country like England, Scotland, or Ireland when men are driven out of employment there is no great free Northwest with 160 acres of good free land offered as a homestead, and a pre-emption to go and get for the taking. They have to stay where they are. There is no outlet, therefore they are obliged to suffer. One thing mitigates their sufferings, the money those men get for their wages, though less than what our workmen receive, will buy twice as much.

The Englishman's $3 will buy a coat that costs our workman $6 anywhere in this country; when the man who works all week needs a coat on Saturday night and must have it, there is no real difference in the wages if the Englishman can get the same coat for $3 that the American laborer has to pay $6 for—he must have a coat, the whole week's wages is gone in getting it; the one is just as well off as the other. So when he has to buy his wife's dress or the raiment his children must wear the proportion is the same, it is the purchasing power of the wages that determines their value to the laborer. To-day 97 per cent. is the average tariff tax on the blankets under which the poor man must sleep.

If a man works for $1 in one place and for $2 in another and he has to pay his $2 for a blanket, the man who works for $1 can buy the same blanket, for he who gets a dollar for his wages is just as well off as the other is with two.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator spoke a moment ago about the greater rate of wages in England over those of France and of Belgium. That is all true, but there is a greater rate of wages in England now than there was twenty-five years ago, and what is the reason? Because England has found it necessary in the last twenty-five years to raise the wages of her skilled workmen or she could not keep them. By the thousand they left England and England's policy and came to this country where they could get better wages and better prices, until England was compelled to raise their wages or lose them; and what has been the effect?

She has been pursuing the policy of manufacturing as cheaply as possible, and cheaper and cheaper every year, so that with the facilities for commerce with which she accompanied that policy she could put her manufactured products in foreign markets cheaper than anybody else. But when she was compelled to raise the wages of her employés, her skilled mechanics, she raised necessarily the cost of her products until Germany and France are to-day supplanting her in the foreign markets, and she is driven to the wall between the higher wages paid our mechanics here and the lower wages paid in Germany and France. So by reason of the cost of her products in foreign markets she is losing them as between her and Germany and France.

One thing is true, she must manufacture cheaper than anybody else or she can not sell cheaper than anybody else; and when anybody else shall pay less wages than she does, then that somebody else will manufacture cheaper than she does. We do not enter into competition with her on that ground. We pay our men more than she does, and for the sake of having the foreign market side by side with her, we refuse to enter into a competition of cheap labor. That is the reason; and we must make it up by increased facilities or we lose it.

Mr. BECK. Whereabouts is the question that the Senator rose to put?

Mr. DAWES. I have given it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. A sure-enough question? [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. A sure-enough question. [Laughter.] May I ask it?

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky in all seriousness, because it really goes to the root of this matter as it appears to me, whether he thinks that the condition in its final outcome in the daily and yearly happiness and prosperity of the English and Scotch workingman is better or worse than that of the workingman in the United States of America?

Mr. BECK. I answered before that there is no comparison in my judgment between the comfort and the prospects of the people of this and of any other country. The people of the world have recognized that. I said that over five millions, nearly six millions, of people have come from Europe to this country in the last twelve years—more people than we had on this continent at the time John Adams was elected President. They came to better their condition and to take up our free lands. Germany sends every year twice as many able-bodied men as compose the Army of the United States. Of the two hundred and fifty thousand Germans who come annually fifty thousand are able-bodied men.

That has been about the average. How can we help being better off than the people of the Old World? We are a people young and vigorous, inhabiting a great continent, with labor comparatively scarce, and therefore comparatively dear; not 10 per cent. of many of our most prosperous young States is yet subdued. There is not over 7 per cent. perhaps in Minnesota; there is not over 5 in Dakota; not over 2 in Montana and Wyoming; there is not over 5 in Colorado. Wages are obliged to be higher here then elsewhere. Supply and demand regulate that. Wages, like everything else, are regulated by scarcity or abundance. Competition settles rates of wages. If a man can not get what he wants in a factory he may be able to make more by working on his own farm, which he can get by going and taking. Of course he will not work at starvation rates with that right open to him.

It is a question of supply and demand. No other country can offer such inducements. This being a larger country and a smaller number of people in it than anywhere else, wages are obliged to be higher. It is for that reason that the men of New England have gone to Canada for laborers, and, as some one told me just now, shipped over five hundred Italians the other day. They hire the cheapest labor they can get. They need not try to make anybody believe that they are paying higher wages from pure philanthropy, or because they are endeavoring to aid American labor. Three-fourths of our laborers are absolutely beyond the power of Congressional protection.

All the men who work on farms are necessarily unprotected, though they are indirectly taxed to death. All the men who build railroads, all the carpenters, the stone-masons, the blacksmiths—even the doctors, the lawyers, and other professional men are laboring men as well as anybody else, as the Senator from Vermont properly observed—the hack-drivers, the men and the women who work about houses, all are unprotected. And because a few men have been smart enough to get machinery that will manufacture now twenty-fold what could be manufactured by machinery twenty years ago, and keep up the same tariff to protect that machinery which, although it produces so much, needs only a few hands to run it, when there is an oversupply they organize strikes, turn out the laboring men, grease the machinery to keep it from rusting, and wait until prices are higher, having excluded everybody else from competing with them and forbidding every man who is obliged to sell his products abroad from buying what he needs unless he buys from them at their prices. Under these conditions the manufacturer can afford to wait until his supplies are exhausted before he makes more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which way does my friend from Kentucky answer the question I propounded?

Mr. BECK. I answered that we were better off in this country than the people of any other country, and we are better off in spite of a protective tariff. The tariff can not bring the people on a great continent like this down to the condition of the thickly settled countries of Europe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My question was—and I should like to get a direct answer, because I know my friend from Kentucky is able to give it if he chooses—is or is not in his opinion the condition of what are ordinarily called the working classes of the United States (and by "classes" I do not mean social classes, for I do not believe in that sort of thing any more than the Senator does, for I am a believer in the rights of men), no matter how recently they have come over or whether they were born here, infinitely better in respect of their daily and yearly happiness and prosperity than that of the similar sorts of people in England and in Scotland? I should like to have my friend from Kentucky, because he is a master of the subject, tell me plainly, yes or no, whether he thinks I am right in that inquiry or wrong?

Mr. BECK. I have answered that twice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which way?

Mr. BECK. I have answered with very great distinctness that the people in all situations and conditions, laborers and others, in this country, are and must be better off than they are in any other country in the world, and that they are so in spite of very many bad laws, and that they would be infinitely better off but for the hold that bad legislation has taken upon the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, may I ask——

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. I said before, and I repeat, that in a country like this, with every variety of soil and climate, free from all the exactions that exist in many of the countries of Europe, where the best years of men's lives have to be spent in the army or in the navy, or in rendering service to their superiors, whether they are kings, emperors, or what not—that in a country like this, where all power comes from the people presumably, where no man is obliged to give a day of his labor from the day he is born until he dies to anybody but himself, and the people are protected by laws made by themselves, he ought to be better off and he is better off, and the people of the world recognize it. Hardly any man can buy himself a farm, hardly a home in old countries that have been settled for centuries. The limit is so small in proportion to population that property is too high for a laboring man to acquire a homestead. No man can be as prosperous and happy in that condition as a man who can get his 160 acres of good land for nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But if the Senator will pardon me, the real point just now is not on the capacity to acquire land, but it is on the capacity of the man who has not any land in this country or any other, who is working daily for his daily bread in a shop or factory or on a street-railroad or wherever else, whether he gets on better with all these bad tariff laws spoken about here, or in the other country. The question is not whether he can get land, but what is the amount of his wages.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to be required to answer the same thing eight or ten times over. I answered distinctly that the laboring men in this country are better off and ought to be better off than they are anywhere else, and that no legislation that Congress can impose upon them can prevent them in a great country like this from being better off than they are in any of the old countries of Europe. They are freer men. They are not required to give time either to the military or naval service.

There is no discrimination or distinction in society against any man, no matter how poor he is. He may be sent to this Senate or be President of the United States; his children's ambition may be gratified to the extent of their ability. All these things are denied men in other countries, and why should people not be better off and more contented here? Who would think of asking such a question as that in the midst of conditions such as are known to exist here and elsewhere? What has that to do with the question we are discussing now?

By our bad laws, I maintain, we injure only ourselves. If our people had the right to make their wages go as far as the people in Europe can make their wages go they would be better off. The Englishman's dollar will buy him 10 pounds of sugar, while the dollar here will buy the American workingman 6 pounds. Ten dollars will buy a suit of clothes in England that can not be bought here for $20; and everything else is in the same proportion.

Here the taxes are laid in the interest of the millionaires who control this Government in great part on everything the poor man needs. In England taxes are imposed on incomes, on land, on wealth in its various forms, and the English workman who does not drink whisky or use tobacco, with the exception of a small tax on tea and coffee can buy anything that he and his family need from their cradle to their coffin in the cheapest market in the world, and the government does not charge him a cent for its revenues upon it; whereas the American workman can not buy anything from his cradle to his coffin; everything that he or his wife or his children need is taxed from 40 to 90 per cent. before he has the privilege of buying it with the wages he earns by his hard labor.

Mr. EDMUNDS rose.

Mr. BECK. I want to go on a little while longer now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask there how the workingman gets his money.

Mr. BECK. France has been trying to subsidize ships in the last few years and thought she was going to rival England. The Secretary of State, in Executive Document No. 172, has sent us the result of some of the examinations made by our consuls into the success that France has achieved. The Secretary announces that he thinks it is a failure, and he refers to a good many statements, some of which I will read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the document?

Mr. BECK. It is Executive Document No. 172, being the Mercantile Marines of Foreign Countries, in a message of the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This session?

Mr. BECK. Yes; in relation to the Mercantile Marines of Foreign Countries. A message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in relation to the mercantile marines of France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy, signed by Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, Executive Document No. 172 of this session, in which, after giving a number of tables and telling the large bonus that had been given to encourage the building of French ships, Worthington C. Ford, chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of State, under date of April 7, 1886, uses this language:

> Ships are an instrument of production, but apart from their actual construction they act more in distributing commodities already made, and by extending the market perhaps indirectly influence future production. By themselves, however, they do not directly produce, and may even prove destructive. To parallel existing lines of steamships where the facilities are sufficient to meet the demands made upon them is quite as destructive and wasteful as to parallel existing lines of railroads where the traffic does not overtax their capacities. The amount of carriage that can return a fair profit upon one may not return even the actual expenses of maintaining two lines, and is not enlarged by merely increasing the number of instruments of distribution.
> No doubt the commercial needs of the world have increased marvelously in the last twenty-five years. In 1860 less than 6,000,000 gallons of crude oil were exported from the United States; in 1885 more than 81,000,000 gallons were exported; and the total exports of petroleum products amounted in 1885 to 574,668,180 gallons, as compared with 23,210,369 gallons in 1864. In 1860, 4,155,153 bushels of wheat were sent out of the country, and in 1885 more than 84,653,714 bushels were exported.

Then he proceeds to show that notwithstanding all the stimulants that have been supplied by France—

> At the same time a study of the commerce of France goes to show that the increase of tonnage engaged in the trade with these countries has not been accompanied by an extension of the trade itself; the imports and exports have not only not increased, but in the larger number of instances have actually decreased.

Just as was our experience when we subsidized the Brazilian line and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's lines, and subsidized other lines from which we developed no trade, and they did not seek to build up any. France, pursuing the same policy, has experienced the same result. She has built some tonnage, but she has accomplished nothing in the way of obtaining trade.

Mr. Ford says:

> To suppose that the French intended to build and sail ships "for the fun of the thing" is to suppose them capable of studied foolishness. The ships that were to be built and navigated with the aid of the Government were to carry French manufactures into foreign markets, and so encourage and extend domestic manufactures and open new vents for home-made wares.

That is the pretense here.

> Unless the statistics are false this result has not been attained, and it would almost seem as if there had occurred a mere transfer of carriage; what was brought formerly in ships sailing under foreign flags is now brought in French vessels. The French steam shipping participates in the trade with North America to the extent of 55.5 per cent. instead of only 37.2, as in 1880; in that with South America to the extent of 62.4 per cent. instead of 49.8 per cent., as in 1880; and in the trade with all America to the extent of 59.9 per cent., instead of 45 per cent., as formerly.

Our consul at Havre, Mr. Dufais, supplies information on this point in these words:

It is the unanimous opinion of all the people interested in shipping here, that even with the bounties given French ship-builders are unable to compete with British ship-yards, as the proportion of cost per ton of building a ship in France to the cost of building one in Great Britain is as 1 to 1.25 to 1.30.

From this fact the British ship-yards were, upon the passage of the bounty law in 1881, stimulated into great activity, because the French could better afford to have their ships built by the British and receive half the bounty, as above mentioned, than to pay the prices demanded in France for construction and get the whole bounty, both for navigation and building. * * *

So, then, for the last two years there has been very little ship-building in France, and at the present time there is almost nothing doing.

Consular Agent Sutton, at St. Nazaire, says:

With regard to the number and origin (French or foreign construction) of the vessels to which bounties have been granted, it would appear that 141 steamers (49 French and 92 of foreign build) had benefited by the law; that 59 iron sailing vessels (27 French and 32 foreign) and 563 wooden ships, of which number 452 were built in France and 111 abroad, had also received bounties. * * * The general opinion on the bounty question is that it has failed to produce the effect of serving the shipping trade, and has only resulted in creating a few large steamship companies who have monopolized the whole of the carrying trade to the exclusion of sailing vessels.

Mr. Ford winds up in these words:

The bounties have succeeded in infusing life into neither ship-building nor ship navigation. France finds it cheaper to have her iron vessels built in Great Britain and a large share of her wooden ships in other countries. The lines of ships that were called into being through the liberal offers of the government are represented as being in a state of bankruptcy, and existing lines that participate in the bounties are either paying no dividends, or very small amounts. The exports of France, reflecting as they did the slight reaction which ensued in 1879, have since declined and are still declining in value, and the decrease can not be explained by a fall in the prices of commodities, but rather by an absolute decrease in the foreign commerce of the nation. In fact, it may be asserted that the bounty policy of France, intended to bridge over a temporary depression, has aggravated the situation, and has proved itself to be a source of mischief and not of cure.

Respectfully,

WORTHINGTON C. FORD,
Chief of Bureau.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Department of State, April 7, 1886.

That is the result, so says the report, of five years of bounty which I have heard lauded on this floor as being a sure evidence that France was going to take away from England the ship-building that she had been doing for her, just as this country would do if we would give them a little bounty to carry the mail or give a few men $800,000 for carrying 8 per cent. of it after bounties had for fifteen years failed to develop any new trade. Germany is said now to be making the same effort.

There are other reasons also, and I may as well mention them as I am on this point, why we are told that it is so important to build our own ships, and that we are being made tributary to England if we allow her to build them. As I said, experience shows there are just so many ships needed to do the carrying trade of the world. England builds all those ships now. Does it make any difference to England whether she builds those ships for an American, a German, a Frenchman, an Italian, or a Swede? The money of one is as good to her as the money of the other.

Are we any better off by refusing to participate in that trade ourselves, limited as we are now to 15 per cent. even of our own carrying trade; or is England any worse off because we refuse to do it, if she can build all the ships that are needed and obtain the money for building them from the German, the Frenchman, the Italian, and the Swede? What do we make by saying we will not condescend to allow our flag to float over a ship built in another country when ships built in that other country are waving the flags of all nationalities and are doing all the trade of our own country, and we are sitting by too proud to have anything to do with it because we do not and can not build the ships, and England is building enough to do all the work and getting exactly the same amount of money from other people who are less proud but a great deal wiser in business transactions than we are? That is all there is of it.

Mr. PLUMB. Why would not the Senator carry out his argument to its logical conclusion, and advocate the introduction of foreign ships into our coastwise service?

Mr. BECK. The coastwise service is organized on a different idea altogether.

Mr. PLUMB. And we want to organize our foreign service on a different idea altogether.

Mr. BECK. Then why do you allow the men of Germany, of France, of Italy, and of Sweden by treaty to trade with this country on the same terms that our people can trade, while they buy their ships wherever they please, and we will not do it ourselves? We let them buy for $200,000 a ship for which our people must pay $300,000. Is there any sense in that?

Mr. PLUMB. That does not touch the question.

Mr. BECK. I should like to know why it does not. It touches the whole question of trade.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Kentucky was arguing that because Great Britain could make ships cheaper and because of a benevolent idea in her mind she did not care whose money she got for them and ours was as good as anybody else's, therefore we ought to put those ships under the flag of America. I say if that is a good thing for the foreign service, why not apply it to the coastwise service as well?

Mr. BECK. I come back to it. The fact is conceded that the people of every other nation but ours buy their ships where they can buy them cheapest. The further fact exists that every other nation can carry on trade here on exactly the same terms that we can ourselves. Now I ask why should our people engaged in our trade be forced to pay $300,000 for a ship that all our competitors can buy for $200,000 and engage in our own trade with?

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator from Kentucky say that any American who wants to buy a foreign ship can not do it?

Mr. BECK. He can not buy a foreign ship and run it as an American ship.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there any advantage to it to be under the American flag?

Mr. BECK. Then what is all this cry in regard to American ships about?

Mr. PLUMB. That does not answer my question. I asked in the first place if an American can not buy a foreign ship and run it just as well as a foreigner. I asked him then if there is any material advantage in a ship being registered under the American flag.

Mr. BECK. What are we maintaining——

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator says there is no sentiment in all this business.

Mr. BECK. Not a bit. What are we maintaining a navy for? What is the protection of a country through its navy worth? If England was in controversy with France or with Germany and this country was not, and a ship flying either flag was owned by American citizens, she could be seized and taken by the other and the Navy of the United States and all the power of the United States could not protect her; but if she had the American flag over her and had an American register she would be safe against all the attacks of all the powers of the world with whom we were at peace, and she can have all the benefits secured by our treaties. Is that nothing?

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is a good deal.

Mr. BECK. I think so too.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that illustrates it.

Mr. BECK. The moment we get an American ship registered she has to have American officers; she has to have American sailors to a certain extent. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] announced last Congress in his argument that we had no sailors now; that 95 per cent. of the few we had were foreigners, and they are generally of the most worthless sort. When we had ships of our own under our flag up to 1860 we had ninety thousand American sailors. I will not forget the coastwise trade, and I will come back to it now.

Mr. PLUMB. Will not the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. PLUMB. He says there is no sentiment in this business. I am on his platform now, and want to ask him upon the fair, non-sentimental, financial basis which he has announced here as the American platform on which he is willing to stand whether or not the American who desires to buy a foreign ship can not buy that foreign ship and can not operate it with the same financial advantage that he could if it was an American ship?

Mr. BECK. If he does, he has to sail it without protection from his Government.

Mr. PLUMB. Can not the Senator say whether he can or not?

Mr. BECK. I am not to be asked a question and told what I must say.

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. BECK. If he buys a ship he has got to sail it under English colors and deny to his own country that he is the owner.

Mr. PLUMB. Would that be offensive to an individual?

Mr. BECK. It would not be to the Senator from Kansas, but it might be to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PLUMB. Would it to the Senator from Kentucky? I rather infer it would not be to the Senator from Kentucky. I suppose he would like that flag.

Mr. BECK. Flings of that sort are not argument. I like the American flag as well as the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. You do?

Mr. BECK. I do. I will not talk about the place where I was born. I was born in a good country. I moved to a good country and I have been treated well by the people since I have been here. I have done my duty to this country as I understand it; and it is a poor argument to suggest that I, because I did not happen to be born where the Senator was born, can not argue a question fairly. I hardly think that is worthy of him.

Mr. PLUMB. I had forgotten for the moment that the Senator from Kentucky was born outside the United States; but I assure him that the argument which he makes is no better and no worse than the argument which I have heard from gentlemen who, unfortunately I think, were born on American soil. As to the fling that he speaks of, I think on the whole he gave me ample excuse for it. He knows I do not want the vessel in the case supposed to sail under the British flag, and yet he accused me of wanting that.

Mr. BECK. There is a misunderstanding perhaps. The Senator from Kansas and myself have always been friends and I have too good an opinion of him to say anything unkind. I beg pardon.

I was going on to say, if I have not forgotten exactly where I was in regard to the coastwise trade, that has been reserved to our own people, and I do not propose to change it. That gives enough advantage to our people to induce them to build ships; they have a monopoly of it. Maine and the wooden-ship building regions for a long time had it all to themsevles. Now the iron trade is extending down on the Delaware and elsewhere to Savannah until ships are being built all over the United States and it is not in one corner as in the old wooden-ship time.

I do not seek to deprive American ship-builders of that. But I insist we ought not to give them a monopoly of ships that trade to foreign countries, that carry the wheat, the pork, the beef and the other products that the great region of country where the Senator and I both live must export in ships. In the coastwise trade from one port of the United States to another the advantage that they have should be retained. They ought to build ships no matter what it costs them, and all are protected alike who engage in that trade. Wherever a railroad can not reach, the coastwise steamer can charge whatever she pleases. The goods may rot on the wharf if they do not take them.

Goods may be lying at Wilmington, N. C., may be lying anywhere that need to go to Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York, and no foreign steamer can touch them for she can not load at one port of the United States and unload at another; she can not touch at two ports of the United States. All that is reserved to the coastwise trade; that is a monopoly to the ships engaged in it; that is a bonus reserved for them because they are built here and manned and officered by American sailors. That is the only nest-egg we have left to build up a navy. The men engaged in that coastwise commerce are protected. We pay a high price for it, but we do that because of a number of sailors who are engaged who go from one port to another. We thus keep up shipbuilding and training sailors. For that reason I do not seek to interfere with it.

Mr. PLUMB. If one nest-egg is a good thing and receives the commendation of the Senator from Kentucky, would it not be wise to have two or perhaps three? If it is important to the foreign trade to have it carried in foreign ships under the American flag, it is likewise with the coastwise trade, is it not?

Mr. BECK. Every interest of this country is entitled to whatever legitimate benefits it can receive without injury to other interests. The ship-building interest is an interest not to be neglected if it can be helped, and the coastwise trade that furnishes sailors, furnishes skilled workmen, keeps up a nucleus for seamen, furnishes something for the ship-yards to do—we can protect that, keep foreign nations away from them; we can and do prevent foreigners from competing with them.

We can protect our own citizens in that trade and let them go from one port of the United States to another on perfectly fair terms with each other because we control that by law. But the moment we get beyond our own shores and compete with foreign countries, then we can not protect the vessels in the foreign trade. Germany, England, and Italy have the high seas open to them in competition with us and we can not protest against their competition; but along our own coast from one port to another and along our own line we can exclude everybody but our own people, and the benefit we get from that in a variety of ways is of sufficient importance in my opinion to maintain it even if some injustice is done.

We have no foreign ships. That is agreed. We once had, and nearly ninety thousand sailors, and the best sailors in the world. The Baltimore clippers took the freight away from foreign ships. Many of the men we had were not only American citizens but were men fit to command ships, while now, as the Senator from Maine said, 95 per cent. of the few sailors that we have are foreigners; they are generally of worthless character, too worthless to obtain employment in the great steamship lines of their own nationalities.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator does not desire to misstate me.

Mr. BECK. No.

Mr. FRYE. I never said that 95 per cent. of our sailors engaged in the foreign trade were foreigners, poor, miserable, worthless fellows. I said that 85 per cent., in my opinion, were foreigners, owing us no allegiance whatever. I said nothing about their being a worthless class.

Mr. BECK. I stated that the Senator from Maine said 95 per cent. I may have misunderstood him. I think the RECORD shows 95 per cent. in his speech.

Mr. FRYE. No; 85.

Mr. BECK. Call it 85. That is all I propose to quote; that is all I mean to state as coming from him. I added that as our ships were of an inferior class, the men that we got from foreign nations were of the most worthless class of their sailors, that the better classes were cared for in the great ships of their own nationalities; and while a good deal is said about the cheapness of labor elsewhere, the men who work for those nationalities have it made up to them in ways that we do not make it up to our people in many instances. Take France; the report from there about ship-building is this:

This apparent difference in the prices which men receive for their labor in government yards is because, in the first place, there is steady employment in them, and second, because there is a law in France granting a pension to men who have worked for twenty-five years in the government yards and have reached their fiftieth year, whether they are incapacited for work or not. This pension is at least 600 francs, or $120 a year, and may reach double that sum, and in case of death descends to the extent of one-half to the widow or orphans below twenty-one years. Thus it will be seen that the actual cost of building a vessel in government yards—that is, without considering the pensions—would be much less than a vessel constructed in a private yard.

And the men who work for the governments of Europe in very many instances are cared for when they are old, therefore they can afford to work for less than if they were turned adrift as our men are when another man can be got who will work for less. If we can not build ships ourselves for the foreign trade—no better argument is needed than that we do not—what are we to do? The Alabama and the other confederate cruisers only destroyed 100,000 tons—less than 4 per cent of what we then had.

We lost, it is said, 1,000,000 of tons out of 5,500,000; the other 900,000 tons were transferred to other nationalities to keep them from being captured, and our miserable navigation laws would not allow our people to buy them back; that was the reason they were lost. Only 4 per cent. were captured, yet we have gone down from having 5,000,000 tonnage then to less than 3,000,000 now, and are reduced from 32 per cent. at that time to 15 per cent. at this time in the carrying trade; and yet gentlemen talk about the war having produced these results!

As everybody else in the world buys where he pleases, as the ship is just as good when she sails and carries the commerce of our citizens no matter where she is built, and, as I said, there is no sentiment in trade in regard to a flag. We would buy the Krupp gun to-morrow if we needed it. We buy the Whitehead torpedo in Austria now. Why should we not have ships in an emergency ourselves? Why not buy the one that gives the best service? To-day what is the result of our policy? We are paying $150,000,000 a year to foreign nations. England gets $100,000,000 of it. What does that enable her to do? To feed, clothe, keep in active service one hundred thousand of her subjects as sailors ready to turn upon us at her command whenever necessity arises. What have we got for our defense on the ocean? Is anybody going to attack us on the land? No; the world combined can not touch us here. Our contests will be upon the high seas hereafter. Prudence says and the protectionists say, "In time of peace prepare for war."

What do we need most in time of war? Ships and sailors. Where are they? "Gone where the woodbine twineth." Gone because of the policy that made it an impossibility to build a ship to compete with anybody else on the high seas; our sailors gone to sail under the flags of other nations. Will you tell me that England, whose principal competitor we always were under Democratic rule and a low tariff, when we increased 30 per cent. and doubled our mercantile marine because we could build and do as we please and carried everything before us, desires us to become again a seafaring people? England now builds all the ships of the world and gets the money from the French, the Germans, and the Italians. Of course she wants to get our money for her ships, but we need ships and sailors more than she needs money.

We are spiting nobody but ourselves by refusing to buy; she is enabled by the hundred millions we pay her every year to keep up one hundred thousand more of her armed sailors to be our enemies when needed, and we lie to-day prostrate at her feet. Does she seek to reverse that condition? Are we content with it? Are we protecting American industries? Are we, as American statesmen, preparing for war in time of peace by such a miserable policy? It is the most humiliating condition that intelligent men ever looked at. If we had that $100,000,000 we pay England every year for doing our hauling it would buy us almost half enough ships to carry on our own foreign traffic. Once they became ours they would be American.

We would soon build up yards for repairs all along the coasts of New Jersey, New York, and elsewhere, reducing from time to time, as we ought to, the present miserable protective tariff, which I regard as an incubus hanging over all our prosperity, and we would have once more the sailors we used to have, the sailors we must have, the sailors we may need badly at any moment, sailing under the American flag, no matter where the ship they sail in was bought, because it must not be forgotten that the individual man buys the ship. Gentlemen talk here sometimes as though the United States was proposing to purchase the ships for our mercantile marine. No such thing.

All the United States laws can do or ought to do is to give its citizens fair play in competition with the people who are contending with us; and when we have to contend on the high seas beyond the protection of the United States, and where the United States can not protect our people or our trade, then it is the duty of the Government to see that every instrumentality they need in order to have fair play and every aid it can furnish them to carry their goods when they have to carry them to foreign markets is furnished at the least expense, and to see to it that we have ships and sailors in such condition that the Government can call upon them to defend her honor and her rights if we are ever attacked. That is our duty.

If we can not, under our system, enable the American citizen to build his ship here as cheap as anybody else can abroad, then we ought to say, in God's name, do as all your competitors do, buy your ships wherever you can buy them cheapest; we will put them under the protection of our laws; we will give them the benefit of our registry; we will allow you to sail them under our flag; we will call on them to defend us if we get into trouble; that done we will no longer be in the power of our competitors or our enemies.

Mr. President, I started to speak for an hour or less and I have spoken three and a half hours. I beg pardon of the Senate for trespassing so long on its attention.

Mr. HALE After the Senator from Kentucky has discussed so ably so many subjects I have some modesty in trying to bring the debate back to the measure before the Senate, but with that end in view I ask, Mr. President, that the proposition in controversy be now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment pending will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99 of section 1, the Committee on Appropriations propose to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. HALE. The amendment which has been read is plain, clear, distinct, and everybody knows what it means. I am not for one put to any mental disturbance in supporting it because of the point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky. That a part of the service provided by the Government for the American people is the transportation of the mails at home and abroad, everybody admits. That a discretion on the part of Congress as to the amount to be appropriated therefor exists, no one denies. That an appropriation may be limited in terms to a particular expenditure and under certain methods and for certain purposes, has been known in the legislative experience of every Senator here.

And, moreover, whether the proposition reported by the Committee on Appropriations be germane and in order upon a post-office appropriation bill is not a new question. More than once it has been submitted to the Senate and been declared to be germane to the bill pending. More than one ruling to that effect has been made, so that the Senate finds itself confronted with a proposition that it may well consider under our rules.

I have said, Mr. President, that everybody knows what the amendment means. I do not care whether you call it a subsidy or a subvention, or whether it is an aid to commerce or to the carrying of mails from our own ports to foreign countries; everybody here and elsewhere taking any interest in this subject knows what this means.

It is almost the first attempt that is made by the American Congress to introduce and extend commerce with our neighbors upon this side of the Atlantic. You may call it subsidy. That does not in any way decide the question. That word does not frighten me. It is an honest attempt, after investigation has been made under an act of Congress, to open foreign markets for the increasing overproduction of American labor; and the Senator from Kentucky may make his point of order and seek to delay, and may argue technically that this should not be upon a post-office appropriation bill; it all comes to this, that he opposes this first effort which is being made here by the American Congress to create and establish and continue and increase the market for American products in foreign countries—our neighbors upon this side of the water.

It is not a new thing, Mr. President. There is the history of no country that has found herself with labor producing more than can be consumed at home and with embarrassments arising from that condition which has not sought an avenue, a market for that overproduction in the very manner that is sought by the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The history of what is termed "subsidy" is the history of every nation that has sought to extend its commerce and provide for the products of its labor. Great Britain began it in 1848; and I have here a list of the annual appropriations made by Great Britain as subsidies to steamship lines, always in the British Parliament declared to be for the purpose of building up foreign commerce and finding a market for English-made goods, for the years from 1848 to 1883; and during that time so much did Great Britain become encouraged by the experiment and so much did she see her commerce increasing and her ships upon the sea multiplying in numbers and her influence and her wealth augmented, that she went on from year to year for thirty years increasing each year, so that during those thirty-six years she had paid from her treasury, in just such appropriations as these now in question, $163,653,356; and no English statesman has dared to complain, and no English party and no English administration has ever, in the many conflicts that have arisen in British politics, been arrayed by any hardy statesman there as opposed to this system, as the Senator from Kentucky has declared that the present administration here is opposed to it.

Why, sir, this is bagatelle compared with what Great Britain has done. If for thirty-eight years the American Congress should annually appropriate $800,000 in aid of this attempt to extend American commerce to foreign countries the aggregate at the end of that thirty-eight years would only be but a little more than $30,000,000, against one hundred and sixty-three and odd millions that our British rivals have been glad to give for such an enterprise as we are now seeking to embark in.

And not only are we in the presence of this course pursued by Great Britain, but every other great nation that has sought to become a rival of Great Britain in the commerce of the world has followed in this track. France has done it for years, and, notwithstanding some of the figures cited by the Senator from Kentucky, has persisted in it; and in some of these very South American republics where we are seeking to penetrate and open commercial relations already rivals Great Britain. And we have all seen in the last ten years a new rival swimming into our ken, Germany, adopting and pursuing precisely the same system of subsidies that England and France have adopted, and already, under the influences that have been given by the German Government to her merchant marine in some of the countries of Central and South America, she is in advance of her European rivals.

But, in the mean time, the American people have been otherwise engaged, otherwise busy, and have failed to realize the importance of this great mart for our productions that lies below the Rio Grande and the Gulf of Mexico, the Central and the South American States. There have been far-sighted and prudent statesmen who have believed that we were allowing this trade to slip away from us unwisely, but so great have been the other subjects which have occupied the American Congress and the American people that but little attention was called to this.

A distinguished American statesman ten years ago, with prophetic eye, declared that the condition it might be of danger to the American Republic would arise when it was found to be overproducing, and that the complications that would arise with labor would be such that it well might make the foundations of the Republic to tremble. No man may deny to-day that we are now confronted with just that condition of overproduction.

For years it has been growing but did not become so marked in its effect and danger as at present. The American people had a thousand things to do, as the Senator from Kentucky has said. It was settling up the great West. It was building railroads at a rate that aroused the astonishment and admiration of the civilized world; it was engaged at home, and its energies, and its enterprise, and its capital were taken up with that; but all the time the very process which has been so well described by the Senator from Kentucky, the labor-saving appliances, the might of the ingenuity of men's minds applied to this very purpose of making one man with the aid of machinery, do the work that heretofore has been done by five men, or ten men, or fifty men, has at last wrought out its result, and to-day all over the country there is a condition of stagnation and of unemployed labor because of overproduction. The goods that are made in the cotton factories are piled up mountain-high waiting a market. The woolen-mills are the same. Pennsylvania runs her forges and mills upon half time. All over the country there is the same condition. There is too much wheat produced by the American farmer for consumption at home; the mines, the wells from which come the petroleum, bring out a product that we can no more care for and consume than we could if it came by a deluge upon us.

The result is that labor is embarrassed, that there are commotions, that there are more men to do work than there is demand for the work. As was said in the debate yesterday this is clearly shown wherever there is a strike, men are ready to come in and take the place of the laborers who strike, ready to accept rates of pay, exactions if you choose to call them so, of the employer, because there are more men than there is labor to do. You can not compel by any law or by moral force the manufacturer, the great employer, to go on with the work that is all the time depleting his pocket, and so it is that to-day the condition which was seen in advance by the American statesman to whom I have alluded is right before our door knocking with a force that no man can venture to disregard.

Now, what is the plain remedy? You may discuss protection for three hours, as the Senator from Kentucky has done; you may array the figures and statements on that side and upon the other; and while it is incidentally connected with this subject, and while the Senator from Kentucky, who is what may be called a comparative free-trader, takes the consistent ground in this debate that accords with all the rest of his course on the subject, still the question is now, what can be done for labor in the way of opening the markets of the world? We can not go across the Atlantic for new markets. Where is the market that by geography, that by nearness, that by sympathy, that by neighborhood, the American producer, the American manufacturer would naturally look to, as Great Britain began to look thirty or forty years ago, as France later, and as Germany within the last ten years?

Why, Mr. President, lying south of the Rio Grande and the Gulf line are fifty million of people, the Central and South American states. They are made up of different nationalities, but all of them are of the races who do not naturally incline to mechanical invention or ingenuity, to manufactures; they have not the tendency, in most cases they have not the water power and they have not the fuel by which great manufactories can be maintained at home, and they must look to other countries for the things produced in such manufactories.

Two years ago the attention of Congress was called to this subject, and a commission was provided for for the very purpose of carrying out the object aimed at by the amendment of my colleague which has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations on this bill. An intelligent, able, I think accomplished commission, made up of gentlemen from both parties, appointed by President Arthur, set itself carefully, studiously to the task of investigating this great subject. It began by taking the testimony of shippers, of importers, of merchants, of foreign consuls, and of exporters in our own American ports, and when that work had so far proceeded the commission then took its way into the Central and South American states, and the volume which I hold in my hand, Executive Document 226, is the first volume of a report as interesting to any intelligent American citizen as any narration could possibly be. In some cases it is interesting because it is humiliating to see how it is that with peoples desiring intercourse with our people, yearning for association, anxious to open trade, anxious to increase their acquaintance and intimacy, lying supinely on our backs, we have allowed the trade of these peoples to drift away from us. Here are some of the figures.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Maine will give way I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before that question is put, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected March 31, 1886.

George W. Bell, to be postmaster at Webster City, Iowa.

The following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the foregoing nomination was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the nomination of George W. Bell to be postmaster at Webster City, Iowa, vice John D. Hunter, suspended, submits the following report:

When this nomination reached the committee a request was sent to the Postmaster-General for all of the papers in the case. This request was complied with, and the papers relating to the suspension of Mr. Hunter, as well as those relating to the nomination of Mr. Bell, in that way came into the possession of the committee.

From the papers thus furnished by the Postmaster-General, in compliance wich the request of the committee, it appears that Mr. Hunter had been postmaster at Webster City for several years, and was reappointed December 20, 1884, for a term of four years.

Mr. Bell, the present nominee, seems to have fixed his mind in the purpose of acquiring this particular office before the beginning of the term of the present national administration.* A letter bearing date March 1, 1885, appears in the files, addressed by Mr. Bell to "President Cleveland," in which he asked for an appointment as postmaster at Webster City, Iowa, and inclosed a number of letters supporting his application from leading and influential members of the Democratic party of Iowa, all of which appear in the files submitted to the committee by the Postmaster-General.

No action seems to have been taken by the President relative to this application until the 28th of July, 1885, when he suspended Mr. Hunter and designated Mr. Bell to discharge the duties of the office.

In the mean time the now celebrated official letter of the Postmaster-General, in which he suggested the filing of charges of offensive partisanship against public officers, was issued. That letter bears date April 29, 1885, and contained the following paragraphs, namely:

"I shall beg you, therefore, to consider the suggestions I make as to the methods of procedure, and if you can adopt them and get some cases ready within the next two or three weeks, I think within the month of May I can give substantial relief, that will take away the importunity and discontent.

"I think that from 15 to 20 per cent. of the fourth-class postmasters in Ohio might be removed within the next two months and great good accomplished thereby if our people will adhere to a proposed plan.

"That is, in fact, to pick out the most obnoxious and offensive partisans in each county to the number of a sixth to a quarter of all, and choose first-class men to take their places. I will require no more proof of partisanship in these selections than the affirmation of knowledge on the part of a Representative or Senator that the postmaster has been an active editor or proprietor of a Republican newspaper printing offensive articles, easily shown by the slips, or a stump speaker, or a member of a political committee, or officer of a campaign club, or organizer of political meetings, or that his office has been made the headquarters of political work, or that his clerks have been put into the performance of political duties. Possibly other acts of equal force may be noted in some cases."

Mr. Bell and his friends acted on these suggestions promptly, and forwarded to the President specific charges of offensive partisanship. The communication containing the charges is dated May 16, 1885. This document was also submitted to the committee by the Postmaster-General. The charges consisted of allegations of Mr. Hunter's active partisanship; that he was editor and publisher of an offensive Republican newspaper, and that he devoted more time to that and active party work than he gave to the office; that he was a "convention-goer," and left the affairs of the office largely to the care of others; that he used the office for partisan purposes, and other like charges, filling the measure of the suggestions contained in the said letter of the Postmaster-General.

There does not seem to have been any fault found with the general administration of the affairs of the office, nor any intimation that there was any shortage or other trouble with Mr. Hunter's accounts with the Government, and so there is nothing in the case affecting his character or reputation as an official or as a citizen, nor anything tending to question his personal or official integrity. It is a pure case of alleged offensive partisanship. But it seems to have moved the President to action, for, as already stated, he suspended Mr. Hunter on July 28, 1885, and designated Mr. Bell to take charge of the office, and he is now nominated to the Senate, and its advice and consent is asked to his appointment to the office which he is temporarily filling.

Mr. Bell entered on the duties of his office soon after the designation of the President was made, but he did not pretend to discharge them, or to give attention to the affairs of the office. He was the editor of the Democratic paper published at Webster City, as Mr. Hunter was of the Republican. He took charge of the office on the 15th of August, 1885, and trusted its management to others. He at once took upon himself partisan obligations, wholly inconsistent with attention to the duties of the office.

The following list of appointments to make political speeches was published in his own newspaper, namely:

"From the circular issued by the State central committee we clip the following:

"Hon. George W. Bell, of Webster City, will speak at Creston, Friday, September 18, 8 p. m., with Whiting; Osceola, Saturday, September 19, 1 p. m., with Whiting; Charlton, Saturday, September 19, 7.30 p. m., with Whiting; Perry, Monday, September 21, 7.30 p. m.; Coon Rapids, Tuesday, September 22, 1 p. m.; Manning, Tuesday, September 22, 7.30 p. m.; Harlan, Wednesday, September 23, 1 p. m.; Avoca, Wednesday, September 23, 7.30 p. m.; Audubon, Thursday, September 24, 2 p. m.; Atlantic, Thursday, September 24, 7.30 p. m.; Stuart, Friday, September 25, 7.30 p. m.; Denison, Monday, September 28, 7.30 p. m.; Carroll, Tuesday, September 29, 7.30 p. m.; Marshalltown, Wednesday, September 30, 7.30 p. m., with Whiting; Ames, Thursday, October 1, 7.30 p. m., with Whiting; Jefferson, Friday, October 2, 7.30 p. m., with Whiting; Fort Dodge, Monday, October 5, 7.30 p. m.; Manson, Tuesday, October 6, 2 p. m.; Storm Lake, Tuesday, October 6, 8 p. m.; Marcus, Wednesday, October 7, 2 p. m.; Cherokee, Wednesday, October 7, 8 p. m.; Le Mars, Thursday, October 8, 2 p. m.; Sioux City, Thursday, October 8, 8 p. m.; Sibley, Friday, October 9, 7.30 p. m."

These were appointments in the canvass of 1885, and they commenced, as will be seen by the first date given, soon after he entered upon the control of the post-office at Webster City. His activity as a partisan worker, both before and since his appointment, is a part of the public political history of Iowa. If partisanship constituted a sufficient cause for the suspension of Hunter it should be equally powerful against the appointment of Bell, for it will hardly be claimed that public officers, in order to be entitled to practice freedom of political action, must associate themselves with the Democratic party. This rule does not hold Bell responsible for the partisan activity in which he engaged before he became a public officer, but it does apply to him the principle of the judgment pronounced by the President against Hunter. He was alleged to be unfit to hold a public office because he neglected the trust and duties of the position in order to do partisan work. Bell has done the same thing, and continues to do it. He left his official post of duty, and remained absent for weeks at a time, to do partisan work of the very kind denounced by the Postmaster-General in that part of his letter of April 29, 1885, hereinbefore quoted. He employed himself for weeks at a time as a "stump speaker," and thus brought himself within the Postmaster-General's definition of an offensive partisan. If that definition is to be taken as a rule of conduct to which public officers must conform, it applies to this case, condemns the action of the nominee, and invites his rejection by the Senate.

As Mr. Hunter was holding the office from which he was suspended for a definite term on account of alleged offensive partisanship, and as Mr. Bell, after entering upon the discharge of the duties of the office to which he was designated by the President, abandoned his post of official duty to engage in more active, extensive, and continuous partisan work than was alleged against Mr. Hunter, the committee can but conclude that his conduct after entering upon his office was not brought to the attention of the President, and that his nomination to the Senate was an unintentional violation of the policy of the administration in respect of such cases. The committee therefore reports the nomination to the Senate adversely, and recommends that it be rejected.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate April 20, 1886.

A. B. Keith, nominated to be postmaster at Denison, in the county of Crawford and State of Iowa.

APRIL 28, 1886.

The following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the foregoing nomination was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the nomination of A. B. Keith, to be postmaster at Denison, Iowa, vice J. Fred. Meyers, whose term has expired, submit the following report:

Mr. Keith moved in the matter of securing the nomination which was referred to the committee, in the early months of the present administration. He stated his case and claims in a letter dated May 26, 1885, and addressed to Hon. B. T. FREDERICK, M. C., from the fifth Congressional district of Iowa, and which is here copied at length, namely:

BULLETIN OFFICE, Denison, Iowa, May 26, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: While I do not wish to impose burdens upon any one, or tread upon the patience of a man who has been so generous to my interests as you have, I desire to call your attention to a feature of my case. Hon. J. Fred. Meyers, the present postmaster, who has held the office for eight years, edits the Review, one of the ablest and most bitter of Republican papers, a sheet from whose columns the stench of Halpin incense arose like malaria from a swamp during the campaign. He was offensively partisan in the highest degree, not only through his papers, but upon the stump, as an organizer and general factotum for dirty work. I have made no attempt to secure his removal before his time expires, the 6th of December next, but according to Vilas's letter he is not eligible to the office under a reform administration. In addition to his Review he publishes a German Republican paper, which his salary as postmaster has enabled him to put on a good footing and paying basis.

This German paper is a stumbling-block in local politics, for it reaches a class of non-English-speaking Germans who were formerly Republicans, and who can be reached only in their own tongue. The effect of this in a close contest is dangerous. It may decide a Representative or Senatorial fight, to say nothing of purely local politics. To overcome this influence and preserve the strength, and insure the permanent growth of our local Democracy, it is necessary to have a German Democratic paper. This I can establish if I get the post-office, and guarantee a permanently Democratic county. My aspirations, then, are of concern to the State Democracy, just in proportion as Crawford County is necessary as a permanent bulwark along the line of Democratic defenses.

This fall we desire to elect a representative again. The Republicans will make almost any local sacrifice to prevent it. The Review and Zeitung, backed by the prestige and salary of the post-office, will shrink at no scruple to elect a Republican. Two years ago the Republicans nominated a weak candidate. This fall it will be a strong one; our present member, having bolted both the local and judicial ticket last fall, can neither be nominated or elected by Democrats, and a new man will be put in the field. Every element of success should be converted into a weapon of aggressive warfare. Could I be assured of the post-office appointment shortly, or even at the expiration of Meyers's term, I would put a German paper in the field for active service in the coming campaign this fall. I can not afford, however, to take a step of this kind, involving great expense and no income for a year or two, unless a prospective salary enables me to do so. It rests with the leading Democrats of the State as to whether I am assisted in an earnest effort to build up and strengthen the Democracy of this State by strengthening that part represented by Crawford County.

Without intruding on either your time or patience, I would like your advice as to whether it is practicable for me to await till midwinter before determining the outcome of my ambitions.

With thanks for many kindnesses, I remain, truly yours,

A. B. KEITH.

Hon. B. T. FREDERICK,
Marshalltown, Iowa.

The gentleman to whom this letter was addressed forwarded it to the Postmaster-General, accompanied by the following letter of his own, namely:

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA, May 28, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter will commend itself to any one who will read it; and I do know we have not got a more zealous writer or a more able stump speaker in the State. Mr. Keith spent his entire time in the field in the last campaign; is a young man of very unquestionable character; and is, no doubt, soon to be one of our party leaders in the State, and I hope to see him reap his reward.

Very truly yours,

B. F. FREDERICK.

To the POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

There are numerous letters on file in the case of like tone and character with the foregoing from Democratic members of Congress, national, State, and county committee men, and from members of the party to which Mr. Keith belongs, and occupying influential positions in its affairs in the several localities in Iowa. Taking the case in its entirety, there is no doubt of Mr. Keith's efficiency as a partisan worker. He has long been the editor and publisher of a Democratic paper at Denison, Iowa, which has certainly equaled in the "offensive partisan" character of its articles anything of the kind that has ever appeared in the journal presided over by Mr. Myers, even allowing Mr. Keith's characterization of the latter to be correct. If, therefore, the feature of "offensive partisan" publications, is to have any force in the case, Mr. Keith is quite as obnoxious to it as Mr. Meyers would be were he the nominee sent to the Senate by the President, unless it is to be understood that the only persons who are to have freedom of action in this regard are such as belong to the Democratic party. The committee has not been disposed to conclude that it is the President's purpose to attempt to establish so obnoxious a doctrine as this in this country.

In his letter hereinbefore copied, Mr. Keith states with great definiteness the reason why he desires to be made postmaster at Denison. He believes it to be of interest to the Democratic party in Crawford County to have certain influence wielded by Mr. Myers overcome. Therefore he wrote in that letter:

"To overcome this influence and preserve the strength and insure the permanent growth of our local Democracy, it is necessary to have a German Democratic paper. This I can establish if I get the post-office, and guarantee a permanently Democratic county. My aspirations, then, are of concern to the State Democracy, just in proportion as Crawford County is necessary as a permanent bulwark along the line of Democratic defenses."

There can be no two opinions as to what this explicit declaration means. It means that Mr. Keith wants to be made postmaster in order that he may appropriate the salary and emoluments belonging to the office to the one purpose of establishing a German Democratic paper in the town where the post-office is located, and give his time and attention to editing and publishing the same.

Now, while it can not be said that the purpose thus clearly expressed violates the letter of sections 11, 12, 13, and 14 of the act of January 16, 1883, commonly known as the civil-service law, it must be admitted that it is obnoxious to the spirit thereof, and hostile to the progress of the reform established thereby. Mr. Keith admits, by implication at least, that he can not do certain partisan work which he has in mind unless he can secure the Denison postmastership, and promises that if he secures it he will devote the salary derived therefrom to the promotion of the local interests of the Democratic party. This is clearly antagonistic to the spirit of the civil-service act, and opposed to the public and official declarations of the President relative to appointments to and removals from public office.

The committee is therefore bound to conclude that the President was not informed concerning this explicitly avowed purpose of Mr. Keith when he nominated him to the Senate for appointment to the position of postmaster at Denison, Iowa. The committee concede this relative to the President's action, notwithstanding there is a letter in the files of the case addressed to the President by Mr. Keith, of date November 10, 1885, and filed six days thereafter, in which he says:

"The salary will assist my paper materially in putting it on an equal financial footing with its Republican competitor, that has enjoyed the income for eight years."

In the letter from which this extract is taken, Mr. Keith modestly remarks to the President:

"I ask nothing as a reward for party services, although in 1880 I headed the Democratic State ticket of Iowa as the candidate for secretary of state, and annually take part in political campaigns upon the rostrum. I have edited a Democratic paper in this county since 1874, during which time the county has been redeemed from an overwhelming Republican majority to a substantial Democratic majority."

Still, Mr. Keith does not seem to have desired that his "claims" on account of partisan services rendered, should be overlooked. Hence, he wrote letters to a number of gentlemen residing at different points in Iowa, soliciting their aid in the matter of securing the Denison postmastership. On August 22, 1885, he wrote to Hon. John F. Duncombe, of Fort Dodge, in which letter he says:

"In pursuance of our conversation at Cedar Rapids respecting my claims as an applicant for the appointment as postmaster at Denison, I desire to call your attention to the following points:"

He then proceeds to recount with particularity his partisan services, and concludes:

"I earnestly hope you will give me the benefit of your active influence in this matter, and I will be placed under thousands of obligations to you."

Mr. Duncombe promptly responded, as did other gentlemen written to by Mr. Keith. The letters are all on file in the case, and they make prominent the services of Mr. Keith to the Democratic party as a reason why he should be given the Denison post-office. They urge upon the President and Postmaster-General his services as an editor, speaker, committeeman, and general worker. Indeed, this is so persistently and frequently done that it may have something to do with the formulation of that passage in the President's message to Congress which secured him great commendation from the more advanced class of civil-service reformers, and which was in the following language, namely:

"I venture to hope that we shall never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards for partisan service. Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which upon every change of administration inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of the Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent."

This case is one well calculated to excite the feelings here given utterance, if its files had ever passed under his observation. Certainly after having so expressed himself he could not have nominated Mr. Keith to the Senate except through inadvertence. That it did occur in this way the committee feel bound to concede. The committee therefore recommend that the nomination of A. B. Keith be rejected.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 29, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEES OF COMMISSIONERS UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Attorney-General inclosing an additional estimate by the First Comptroller for fees of commissioners of United States courts for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PROVISIONS, MARINE CORPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an additional estimate from the Secretary of the Navy of an appropriation for provisions, Marine Corps, for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-STATION TWO HARBORS, MINN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board for a light-station at Two Harbors, in Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONFERENCE ON BRIDGE BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a bill of the House with Senate amendments, the bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road. The Chair will state that the Senate has made certain amendments to this bill, and asked for a committee of conference. Before the House can grant that request, of course it must take some action on the amendments.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, there are seven of those bills sent over from the Senate upon which a conference is asked. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments, and agree to the request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will non-concur in the amendments and agree to the conference as requested.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

A like order was made in relation to the following bills severally:

A bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River;

A bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.;

A bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, Cook County, Texas;

A bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company, of Texas, to maintain a bridge across the Red River; and

A bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore in the State of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as managers on the part of the House in the conference upon all these bills the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BYNUM, and the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. WEAVER.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

Mr. RICHARDSON asks that report No. 1927, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to accompany House bill No. 8318, be reprinted, the first print having been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] requests that House bill No. 5609, for the relief of David H. Thompson, and House bill No. 4913, for the relief of John W. Duncan, reported adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs, be placed on the Private Calendar. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CAMPBELL VS. WEAVER.

Mr. HALL. It has been the intention of the Committee on Elections to call up for consideration in the House the contested-election case of Campbell vs. Weaver, from the sixth district of Iowa. Several parties interested have requested that the consideration be postponed; and I now give notice that the case will be called up on Tuesday next.

FRANK H. ISHAM AND WILLIAM E. MALLORY.

Mr. SPOONER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Frank H. Isham and William E. Mallory the sum of $180 each, for three months' service of each of them in the document-room of the House of Representatives.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the House now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1357, which was reported the other day from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1357) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims.

Be it enacted, &c., That the claims of Joseph C. Irwin & Co. and C. A. Perry & Co. for property taken and impressed into the service of the United States, in the year 1857, by orders of Col. Albert Sidney Johnston, in command of the Utah expedition, be, and the same are hereby, referred, with all the papers relating thereto, to the Court of Claims, for adjudication on the proofs heretofore presented and such other proofs as may be adduced.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There appears interlined in this bill an amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. That is an amendment which was offered in Committee of the Whole by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and withdrawn. That was the understanding with the gentleman from Indiana.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. SPRIGGS, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 12, 1886.

Mr. DIBBLE submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

"Resolved, That the clerkship of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be an annual clerkship, with compensation at the rate of $2,000 per annum; and that provision for the payment of such clerk be made out of the contingent fund of the House during the present session at the said rate, and thereafter be provided for as other annual clerkships of committees of this House."

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, have considered the same, and report the following substitute, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the clerkship of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be an annual clerkship, with compensation at the rate of $2,000 per annum, and that provision for the payment of the said clerk be made out of the contingent fund of the House during the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, at the said rate, and thereafter be provided for as other annual clerkships of Committees of this House; and that the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to include the same in the regular annual appropriations.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the original resolution will lie on the table; and the question is on the adoption of the resolution reported as a substitute.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 60, noes 19.

Mr. REAGAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 41.

Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. REAGAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a brief explanation in regard to the necessity for the adoption of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. DIBBLE. The resolution is recommended by the Committee on Accounts after full investigation.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being ayes 35, noes 82—more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 96, not voting 106; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports for reference.

LEWIS F. CASEY.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8329) to relieve Lewis F. Casey, of Illinois, of disabilities under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY OF NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 7094) to ratify and confirm an agreement made between the commissioners appointed on the part of the State of New York and the commissioners appointed on the part of the State of New Jersey respecting the location of the northern boundary line between the States of New York and New Jersey, and the replacing and erecting of monuments thereon, bearing date the 7th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1883; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 2138) for the redemption of trade-dollars;

A bill (H. R. 2082) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for standard silver dollars and other silver coin of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 2069) for the retirement of trade-dollars from circulation;

A bill (H. R. 2057) to authorize the redemption, exchange, and recoinage of trade-dollars;

A bill (H. R. 1749) to retire the trade-dollar coinage; and

A bill (H. R. 1497) for the retirement of the recoinage of the trade-dollar.

RETIREMENT AND RECOINAGE OF THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, also reported, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing bills, a bill (H. R. 8330) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRRIGATION.

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1092) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REFORM SCHOOL, DAKOTA.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2825) granting to the Dakota Territory section 16, township 103, range 54 west, in the county of Aurora, in the said Territory, for the purposes of a reform school, and granting to said Territory one section of land in lieu thereof for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SHORT CREEK LAKE, MISSOURI.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4989) to donate Short Creek Lake, in Platte County, to the State of Missouri and forever preserve the same for public resort and recreation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. HEWITT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3289) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

YELLOW-FEVER INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills now begins at ten minutes past 1 o'clock; and the call rests with the Committee on Commerce. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5542) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the truth of alleged discoveries of the specific cause of yellow fever, and of a method of preventing that disease by inoculation, and to obtain all information possible as to the cause and prevention of that disease.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill and consider the same in the House. Pending that request the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asked for the reading of the bill. The Clerk will read the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill (which will be found in full in yesterday's RECORD) was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill just read, and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRISON. I object. This is a bill to create a commission, make new places, new offices. If this is to be done let us have it done in the regular way. We have done enough in this direction for one day.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5542.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill 5542, beg leave to submit the following report:

The accompanying bill provides for sending an expert commission to Mexico, and if necessary to Brazil, Havana, and the Central American States for the purpose of investigating the merits of the methods pursued by Drs. Freire and Carmona for the prevention of yellow fever by inoculation, and of obtaining all other information relative to that disease which may be acquired by experiments or otherwise. The manner of preparing the virus by these two physicians is dissimilar, Dr. Freire following more closely the system of Pasteur, which consists of repeated inoculation of the inferior animals until the virus becomes attenuated and modified, when it is introduced into the human body. Dr. Carmona employs the micro-organism which he has eliminated from one of the secretions of a person suffering from yellow fever. The essential principle of each process is the same, viz: the introduction into the animal circulation of a specific virus, which will produce in an extremely mild and modified form symptoms and conditions similar to those existing in yellow fever, and the effect of which is to protect the person from an access of that disease. It is claimed that successful results have attended this preventive treatment, which certain statistical statements would appear to prove.

Dr. Carmona states that in one series of observations during the prevalence of yellow fever of three hundred and eighty persons protected by inoculation, less than 3 per cent. of the number contracted the disease, while under the same circumstances, of one hundred and seventy-five persons not inoculated 32 per cent. were seized with it. He also states that seventy-six inoculated soldiers marching from Vera Cruz to Acayucan were joined by a soldier who had not been inoculated. Upon their arrival at the latter place the unprotected soldier was seized with yellow fever and died, while no case of the disease occurred among his seventy-six comrades.

Other facts of a similar character are related by Drs. Carmona and Freire, which certainly tend very strongly to show the success of this preventive treatment.

Medical investigations in recent times, and particularly the brilliant discoveries of Pasteur, have proved that certain diseases in men and animals which result from a specific contamination of the blood can be prevented by inoculation with the germ which propagates the disease and gives it its peculiar character. The more closely the symptoms artificially produced resemble those of the original disease, the greater is the probability that protection will be derived from them. While the results of the investigations pursued and the preventive treatment adopted in Mexico and Brazil are extremely satisfactory, they are not absolutely conclusive.

It is therefore important that further scientific observations and experiments should be instituted in order to establish beyond controversy the facts relating to this subject so vital to the interests of sanitary science, commerce, and humanity.

In order that accurate results can be obtained, it will be necessary that the methods pursued shall be observed during the prevalence of the disease by thoroughly skilled experts and physicians. The microscopic appearances of the blood and secretions should be noted. The form of the specific germinal principle should be observed and identified; its constant presence in all forms of the disease should be determined; and it may be necessary to transplant and reproduce it in the lower forms of animal life. It should be carefully eliminated from all other microscopic organisms existing in the fluids of the body, so that the results of its action upon the functions and tissues of the human body and animals, when introduced by inoculation, may be clearly ascertained.

Every change connected with its presence under various conditions should be preserved by photographic illustrations carefully and accurately executed.

Then the symptoms and essential character of the natural and artificial disease should be carefully observed by physicians of ability and experience, and the actual value of this treatment established. This should be done in advance of the occurrence of an epidemic of yellow fever in our own country, in order that we may profit by the knowledge thus obtained to stay its ravages, avert the panic which always accompanies its invasion, and save our business interests from the enormous injury it inflicts.

Should the opinions of Drs. Carmona and Freire be justified by thorough and continued observation, their importance to the inhabitants of the tropical and semi-tropical regions chiefly afflicted by this disease can not easily be exaggerated. Yellow fever is one of the three most formidable diseases which afflict the human race. One of these happily occurs at rare intervals; another has been since the commencement of the century successfully controlled by that form of preventive treatment it is now proposed to investigate.

If a similar controlling principle can be applied to yellow fever it will confer a boon upon the people of our Southern Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and of the great Mississippi Valley, hardly second to that which the humane genuis of Jenner has given to mankind. In its highest aspects this question concerns humanity, but for the statesman the commercial considerations involved are of the first importance. The repeated invasions of this grave disease have been a serious obstacle to the prosperity and progress of the States bordering upon the Gulf and Lower Mississippi.

It has repeatedly paralyzed their industries, impoverished their people, and in several instances reduced their cities to bankruptcy. The evil has not been confined to the immediate area visited by the disease; so close are the bonds of commercial intercourse and so intimately blended are the reciprocal currents of trade and business of the interchange of raw and manufactured products between all portions of our common country, that whatever seriously affects the prosperity of any section is speedily felt by all.

Every invasion of yellow fever has seriously affected the business interests of the Eastern, Middle, and Northern States, and every representative of these interests should be equally concerned with the members from the Southern and Southwestern States in the support of every judicious measure for the prevention of this disease.

For the reasons above stated, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

We do not concur in this report.

CHARLES F. CRISP.
ANDREW J. CALDWELL.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for the appointment of a commission to visit Mexico, and if necessary Central America, Brazil, and Havana, for the purpose of investigating the methods pursued in two of those countries for the prevention of yellow fever by inoculation and of pursuing other investigations relative to the nature, causes, prevention, and cure of that disease. The experiments of Drs. Freire of Brazil and Carmona of Mexico, both occupying high official positions in their respective countries and sustained by their Governments in their researches, have recently attracted the attention and interest of the medical profession and eminent sanitarians in our own country, who desire that Congress shall take the action contemplated by this bill. The National Public Health Association, at its recent meeting here, and also the representatives of the State boards of health, in session at the same time, adopted resolutions asking for the appointment of this commission, which I will ask the Clerk to read:

Whereas the question of immunity from yellow fever is so intimately connected with the social, industrial, and commercial growth of Tennessee, the Southern Atlantic and the Gulf States of the Union as to determine the destiny of Memphis, Charleston, Savannah, Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston; and

Whereas a large and accumulating mass of testimony that the power of protecting the unacclimated against yellow fever has been discovered and proven in the inoculation of the essential germ or cause of the disease by methods distinctly formulated and available, these aforesaid declarations and numerous instances cited in corroboration emanating from medical scientists at the head of the biological departments in the highest institutions of learning in Brazil and Mexico, authorized by and bearing the indorsement of their respective governments:

Resolved, That we, the representatives of the boards of health in the several States of this Union, and we, the officers and members of the American Public Health Association, regarding the question as pre-eminently a vital issue, as one in its assumptions true or false, and, if true, of incalculable worth, surpassing the computation of many millions of dollars, and to the saving of tens of thousands of lives of our own people, that we hereby petition and urge upon both branches of Congress now assembled to appoint a commission for the purpose of making a complete investigation of, and reporting after a thorough examination of the methods pursued, their effectiveness in protecting the unacclimated against the yellow fever infection, together with all associated observations and experiments that may be ascertained.

The president of the Louisiana State board of health, who has earned the gratitude of the people of New Orleans by his efficient sanitary and quarantine methods, was before your committee in favor of this bill. Dr. Billings, of the Army, and Gihon, of the Navy, Dr. Toner, a distinguished physician of this city and an eminent authority on yellow fever, and Dr. Hamilton, the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, appeared with him, and each urged the appointment of this commission. Your committee also obtained the views of Dr. Sternberg, who in that department of biology relating to this subject has no peer in our country, and is an acknowledged authority in Europe. He has special knowledge of this disease, having been a member of the commission which visited Havana in 1879 to acquire all the information practicable in regard to yellow fever. He also strongly favors the proposed investigation.

Mr. Chairman, I might well rest the question of the propriety of the legislation proposed in this bill upon the weight of the authority in its favor which I have adduced from the two distinguished bodies which represent the medical and sanitary sentiment of the country, and of the eminent gentlemen who appeared before your committee, and whose opinions are received with the greatest respect here and in Europe; but the House will doubtless desire to hear the reasons which are urged in favor of the bill. For several years Drs. Freire and Carmona have practiced inoculation for the prevention of yellow fever, and they claim that their experiments have been attended with almost entire success.

Dr. Carmona states that of three hundred and eighty persons inoculated by him less than 3 per cent. contracted the disease, while, under similar circumstances, of one hundred and seventy-five non-inoculated persons 32 per cent. were seized with it. He also states that seventy-six soldiers were inoculated, one was not; the last-named soldier was taken with yellow fever and died, while his seventy-six comrades escaped the disease. Other facts are given by both these physicians tending to establish the success of their methods. Dr. Freire claims to have inoculated over five thousand persons, with substantial success. Both Freire and Carmona claim to produce exemption from the disease by inoculating the healthy person with the yellow-fever virus, but they pursue different methods, Freire employing the virus which has been modified and attenuated by repeated inoculations of the inferior animals, while Carmona inoculates directly with virus taken from one of the secretions of the human body.

They claim that they produce in this manner an extremely mild and modified form of the disease, from which no fatal results have occurred, and which is substantially protective, just as vaccination is against small-pox. To corroborate the alleged results of these experiments it can fairly be urged that they are in line with the inferences drawn from vaccination, and that they also harmonize with the revelations of modern biological research. Within twenty years, and notably within the last ten years, extraordinary advances have been made in the study of micro-organisms, and some remarkable practical results have flowed from them. The labors of the famous Pasteur have been so beneficent that he has earned the gratitude of France and the world.

After several years of the most patient and skillful effort, and after repeated disappointments, he discovered the microscopic parasite which was destroying the silk-worm and ruining the silk industry of France. Having discovered this pest, he was enabled to point out the means to extirpate it and thus save this important industry. He subsequently discovered the germ of anthrax or charbon, a fatal disease which affects sheep and cattle; and he has inoculated a half million of sheep and fifty thousand cattle with complete success, no death having occurred among this very large number of inoculated animals.

Results like these silence incredulity, and must stimulate investigation in a field so important and where new and equally beneficent triumphs can reasonably be hoped for. This eminent scientist has just achieved his greatest triumph in the unique discovery that after the poison of hydrophobia has entered the body he can, by the introduction of virus originally taken from the spine or brain of an animal suffering with the disease and attenuated by repeated and numerous inoculations, produce perfect immunity from that horrible disease. I speak with more confidence upon this subject because I have just learned from an eminent biologist and most careful observer, who witnessed his experiments, that he has no doubt of the entire success of his method. He saw a large number of dogs which had been bitten by rabid animals subjected to this process, and not one of them contracted the disease, while a large number of the non-inoculated were seized with it.

When we think of the years of assiduous labor required to produce this marvelous result, of the many failures that were made, of the ingenuity and scientific skill displayed in making the attenuations and cultivating the virus in order that it should have the precise strength requisite to perform its work and not be sufficiently virulent to produce a fatal result, we are filled with admiration of this great scientist and philanthropist. Indeed the wildest dreams of the imagination could not have conceived or the inspired spirit of scientific prophecy have predicted such a glorious triumph of genius over this horrible and fatal disease.

But he is not alone in sucessfully penetrating these mysteries of nature. The great German pathologist, Koch, has proved that consumption is produced by a microbe that for years eluded his investigation, and was only discovered by staining the tubercular specimens observed by the microscope; and still this germ, so minute and transparent that it can only be seen by the microscope in the manner just stated, will, when introduced by inoculation into men and animals, always produce tuberculosis. Other observers have been successfully laboring in the same field, and as the result of their researches it is known that typhoid and relapsing fever, measles, scarlatina, whooping-cough, erysipelas, and several other diseases owe their origin to the presence of micro-organisms peculiar to each disease. The pleuro-pneumonia which has prevailed so extensively and with such fatality among cattle is not only proved to be produced in this manner, but to be preventible by inoculation.

But this House is not an audience of medical men, and I must not weary you. Let me then at once reach the general conclusion to which these experiments lead, as stated by Dr. Sternberg, "that the results obtained by Pasteur in his experiments relating to protective inoculation against anthrax have been of the highest importance, and many persons have been led to share in the sanguine expectation of the distinguished French chemist that not only in this disease but in the infectious diseases generally protective inoculations may eventually be successfully practiced." This process is more likely to prove successful in that class of diseases in which an attack exempts the person from future seizures. Small-pox is one of these protective diseases, and it furnishes the most striking instance of the success of inoculation. Yellow fever is also an infectious and protective disease, and we should expect a priori to ultimately detect the germ which bears a causal relation to it, and whose introduction into the human body by inoculation will prevent the occurrence of the malady.

It is claimed that this germ has been discovered and its protective influence established by various experiments. This is doubted upon the authority of Dr. Sternberg, who when in Havana was unable to detect it, but he states that unfortunately the time allotted to this investigation (three months) was entirely too short to make a thorough experiment or study. He also firmly believes that the organism which is causative of this disease will be discovered, and he also fully and strongly approves of the appointment of this commission. It may be objected that the microscopic experiments of Drs. Freire and Carmona are unsatisfactory and even inconsistent with each other; but if this be so, it by no means proves that their inoculations have not been successful.

The precise form of microscopic organism which causes yellow fever may have eluded their observation as the bacillus of tubercle escaped the eye of Koch, as the germ of small-pox still continues to be invisible, but if present, as it doubtless is in every drop of blood, it will perform its benign mission of prevention just as it accomplishes its work of death whether seen or unseen. So that while it will be the duty of this commission to verify these alleged microscopic observations, it will also be necessary to institute the closest medical examinations and observations to test the main and all-important claim that yellow fever is preventible by inoculation. If this alleged discovery be verified, its importance can not be overestimated. This alarming and deadly disease prevails over an area measured by 40 degrees of latitude, 35 of which are north of the equator, and 55 degrees of longitude.

Its ravages are by no means confined to these limits, as it has visited all the important ports on our Atlantic seaboard (some of them repeatedly) as far north as Quebec and Halifax. Wherever it prevails its mortality is excessive, sometimes as great as 60 per cent. of all the cases. It spreads with rapidity in communities and rapidly extends from State to State, city to city, and village to village, leaving in its dread path bereavement, broken social and family ties, parents forever lost to their children, children to their parents, everywhere woe and desolation. Beneath the dark shadow of this Azrael's wings hope dies, despair alone survives. Ah, Mr. Chairman, such widespread, multiplied, and unutterable affliction is indeed the crucifixion of humanity, the martyrdom of its tenderest and holiest instincts and emotions. It is the pathetic story of Holy Writ, a thousand times repeated, "Rachel weeping for her children because they are not."

You gentlemen who come from the Lower Mississippi Valley and from the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts have witnessed all this. I shall not soon forget the affecting picture drawn of this fearful malady from his personal observation by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Judge REAGAN. The epidemic invasions of this deadly disease are disastrous to the business and commercial interests of large and populous regions of our country. The terror which pervades communities in the presence of pestilence paralyzes business energy. The people of infected localities have no other thought than to escape from the threatened danger.

The ordinary pursuits of life are neglected or abandoned, homes are deserted, the crops are left ungathered, places of business are closed, railroad trains are stopped or move without freight; a rigid quarantine obstructs communication with the outside world. No more serious blow can be struck at the commercial interests of any section of the country than is inflicted by an invasion of yellow fever. It is, viewed in all its aspects, a fearful calamity, destructive to human life and human interests, social and material, the deadly enemy of the development and prosperity of the Lower Mississippi Valley and Gulf coast.

Any agency that would control its ravages would be welcomed as a blessing from Heaven. The discovery of its preventability by inoculation would be second only to that great discovery of Jenner, which, like the setting sun, brightened the evening horizon of the eighteenth century. No achievement of human genius since the birth of history will compare in beneficence with the boon conferred upon mankind by this unequaled benefactor of his race. In all future time generation after generation will bless his memory and delight to honor and exalt his pure and radiant fame. The time will come when savage tribes in distant continents and islands will deify him as the god whose divine touch staid the progress and annihilated the terrors of that pestilence which walketh in darkness and at noonday. The humane genius of medicine did not die with Jenner; it lives and repeats its triumphs.

In the morning of the century the art of auscultation was discovered by Laennec, and the lungs and heart whispered their secrets in the ear of the great Frenchman. Since his day every skillful physician has been able to determine with scientific accuracy the precise condition of these great vital organs.

At its noontide hour came that revelation which flashed to the civilized world the marvelous, the almost miraculous, fact that for the first time since man inhabited the universe science had mastered pain and abolished terror as elements of surgery. Henceforth in all the annals of the healing art, in all the future history of the race, the surgeon's knife was to do its work, however delicate, however prolonged, without fear, suffering, or consciousness on the part of the patient, no matter what tissues were cut or arteries or nerves divided, even if the interior of the body should lie exposed and palpitating beneath its keen blade in searching its inmost recesses to extirpate disease. The patient only knows a sleep and an awakening.

He only knows that whereas he had been visited by mortal disease, he is now, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, restored to newness of life, to health, to hope and joy. It was my good fortune to witness the first public experiment illustrating the effects of anesthesia. There was universal incredulity before the operation, but when the knife was seen to pass repeatedly through the tissues and elicited no sign of sensibility, then every student instantly realized that a new era in medicine and surgery had just dawned upon the world, and he also knew that the name of Morton would never be forgotten so long as suffering and disease continued to be attributes of humanity.

I have already described the rapid strides that microscopic research is making in determining the nature of various diseases, and will only add that surgery is indebted to these discoveries for its later successes. All the methods connected with important surgical operations are conducted while the incised surfaces are protected from the contact of micro-organisms, with the result of largely diminishing their fatality. I have indicated some of the triumphs of a noble and humane art during this grandest of the centuries, so crowded with the achievements of a consummate civilization, whose evening shadows are closing around us to be ere long followed by the unknown splendors of a succeeding age, which will reserve for science its proudest victories and for humanity its most precious gifts.

It has been urged that while this investigation ought to be made it could be as well accomplished by one person as by three. The only reply which needs to be made to this proposition is contained in a letter from Dr. Sternberg, written in response to two questions propounded by me in behalf of the committee, and which I request the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CARROLLTON HOTEL,
Baltimore, Md., January 27, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 25, and to reply as follows:

First. I consider the desirability of such an investigation as is proposed to be beyond question.

Second. There are several reasons for placing such an investigation in the hands of a commission composed of three persons.

(a) Such a commission would be more likely to receive the active co-operation of the Governments of Brazil and of Mexico and of the medical gentlemen whose claims are to be investigated.

(b) The combined testimony of the members composing it would have more weight with the physicians in our own country than would that of a single individual.

(c) The evidence upon which the claim with reference to protective inoculations against yellow fever is based will have to be considered with the greatest care, and will involve a critical inquiry as to all material facts relating to the personal history and surroundings of a large number of inoculated individuals in Brazil and in Mexico. This work can be done more promptly by a commission consisting of three members, and could be carried on at the same time that the microscopical and bacteriological expert on the commission was engaged in an investigation with reference to the special micro-organisms, or "germs," which are said to have been discovered and are supposed to be the cause of the disease.

(d) In an investigation of this kind, undertaken in a distant and unhealthy country, it might happen that sickness would interfere with the prosecution of the work if it depended upon a single individual.

On the other hand, I would say that in case the investigation fails to confirm the claims made by Freire, of Brazil, and Carmona, of Mexico, and a protracted experimental research becomes necessary in order to determine in an exact manner the cause and the best means of preventing this fatal malady, it will not be worth while to place such an undertaking in the hands of a commission consisting of three persons, unless all of the members are experts in the use of the microscope and in modern methods of research in this very difficult field of investigation.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. M. STERNBERG,
Major and Surgeon, U. S. Army.

Hon. R. T. DAVIS, M. D.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAVIS. It may be objected that Congress has no constitutional power to make an appropriation for this purpose. Article I, section 8, clause 4, gives Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. Under this clause Congress has always exercised large powers for the protection and promotion of commerce in order to meet the demands arising from the great variety and rapid development of our domestic and foreign commerce. Judge Story says that the commercial system of the United States has been employed sometimes for the purpose of revenue; sometimes for the purpose of prohibition; sometimes for the purpose of retaliation and commercial reciprocity; sometimes to lay embargoes; sometimes to encourage domestic navigation and the shipping and mercantile interests by bounties and discriminating duties, and by special preferences and privileges; and sometimes to regulate intercourse with a view to mere political objects, such as to repel aggressions, increase the pressure of war, or vindicate the rights of neutral sovereignty.

In all these cases the right and duty have been conceded to the National Government by the unequivocal voice of the people. Certainly the exercise of these varied and important powers by Congress with the sanction of the people must include the constitutional right to legislate for the removal of one of the greatest obstructions to commercial intercourse, an obstruction which prevents ships from entering ports, blocks the channels of trade and intercourse, and inflicts severe and permanent injury upon the interests of commerce. This contemplated legislation can also rest securely upon that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare.

It would seem clear that legislation to check the progress of this deadly scourge is not only in harmony with this provision, but is required and demanded by it in order to provide for the general defense against an enemy whose attacks are as fatal as those of an invading army, and to promote the general welfare by controlling or averting a pestilential disease which is the deadly foe of those human and material interests which comprise the general welfare. This question has been settled by numerous precedents, indeed by the continued practice of the Government from the earliest times. It can not now be unsettled when events of great moment have drawn us more closely together and given a broader scope and deeper significance to our organic law.

The American people have proved themselves to be national in their sympathies, aspirations, power, and destiny, and the great instrument upon which their interests and institutions rest, and which they have preserved through many perils and vicissitudes, has grown with their growth, has proved equal to every exigency, and will endure to the end, the right arm of their strength and the anchor of their safety.

Mr. Chairman, I frankly confess that I greatly desire the passage of this bill, and in its favor I would appeal to this House in behalf of that profession who in the discharge of their humane duties encounter this and other fatal diseases, and exhibit a self-sacrificing devotion and bravery which shames the courage of the battlefield, and who have earned a right to ask us for all the assistance we can render them. I would appeal in behalf of modern science, whose patient, assiduous, unremitting, and unwearied labors and signal and supreme triumphs demand our recognition and admiration. But, highest consideration of all, I would appeal in the name of suffering humanity and in behalf of countless thousands of helpless human beings who are exposed to the ravages of this disease and who implore our protection.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not wish to take the floor in that way. I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Commerce was not unanimous in recommending this bill. A minority of that committee, of whom I am one, dissent from the report in favor of this bill. I object to the proposed commission for the following reasons:

The investigation can be made by medical officers—I do not mean the board of health—now in the employ of the Government, and the worth of the experiments and practice of Carmona and Freire verified without the expenditure of the sum proposed, and the results declared by such investigation, by the said officers, will be as authoritative and command as much respect as if declared by a commission. The Government can and has, without the creation of an expensive commission, sent physicians of eminence to Europe to report upon experiments in the treatment and prevention of cholera, for instance, whose reports and opinions are worthy of and have received the highest respect and confidence.

Secondly, there is not a sufficient scientific probability that the experiments and supposed results obtained either by Carmona in Mexico or Freire in Brazil are worthy of attention or respect. The opinion of the medical profession in the United States is divided, to say the least of it, upon the merits of either system. This is particularly true as to Freire, whose methods are declared in the Medical and Surgical Journal of New Orleans "to be crude, his experiments unconvincing," and it is said that "many medical journals formerly enthusiastic in his praise have lately fallen ominously silent concerning him and his, and that the body of eminent French scientists, to whom he has from time to time communicated his proceedings, have never deemed them worthy of the slightest consideration." That journal further says:

If, however, after all is said, some investigation needs must be had, why can not the Government commission Dr. George Sternberg? He is a bacteriologist of established reputation and a yellow-fever expert of some experience, and one already in the pay and employ of the United States. His traveling expenses alone would be, in our opinion, a handsome sum to pay for a more intimate acquaintance with the cryptococcus xanthogenicus, and we can not stand by and see the people's money expended on such an object without entering our earnest and emphatic protest.

It will thus be seen that a medical journal of New Orleans, one of the principal points to be benefited by the discovery of some means to disarm the yellow fever of its terrors, is by no means convinced that this measure is warranted either from scientific or economical considerations.

But it is said that the methods of Carmona, of Mexico, are worthy of confidence, or rather that results attained by him are of greater positiveness, and that it is of the highest consequence that this Government verify them by the labors and scientific judgment of a commission. It seems that Carmona's method is entirely different from Freire's, and he has determined that the microbe of yellow fever is not the cryptococcus xanthogenicus, but the peronospora lutea. [Laughter.] The one was professedly discovered by Freire in the blood "with as low a magnifying power as 750 diameters, while the micro-photographs, taken by the United States yellow-fever commission in Havana in 1879, with a microscope magnifying from fifteen hundred to two thousand times, failed to show this organism in the blood taken from undoubted cases of the yellow fever in the living subject."

The surgeon of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, Dr. Schmidt, "a most accurate and trustworthy microscopist, and who has had perhaps more experience in the examination of the blood and tissues of yellow fever than any living pathologist, asserts most positively that he has never met this organism in uncontaminated specimens after most careful researches at a quite recent date." Where is then the necessity or wisdom in sending a commission to Brazil to investigate this matter, which has not commended itself to the scientific mind as having any shadow of probability to support it? Evidently there is none, and it seems as if it is tacitly admitted that the only hope to sustain the bill is in Carmona's peronospora lutea. This, a mushroom microbe, he professes to find in the remains of all who die of yellow fever. It is claimed that he has "demonstrated that in the fresh state one can perceive the presence of a round yellow corpuscle shining by refraction of light and gifted with quick motions." "This corpuscle," he noted, "always existed in yellow-fever secretions, and only in that." He pronounces it to be "a zoöspore of the mushroom peronospora lutea, and that it incloses all the other elements—spores mycellium, oögonique breathings, and zoösporanges. [Laughter and applause.]

It seems that Carmona accomplishes the attenuation of the yellow-fever virus by the putrefaction and desiccation of a secretion. A dried particle of this is moistened with distilled water and placed beneath the microscope, and it will show, even when dried for two or three years, microbes easily recognizable. These results are said to be special to yellow fever.

These spores are introduced into the human system by subcutaneous injections, and it is claimed they produce an abortive yellow fever that is limited to the minimum and is protective against attacks of the fever ever afterward. The inoculation is productive of a "miniature yellow fever, which is evolved in a few hours and without danger." "This mitigated fever is to yellow fever what varioloid of the vaccinated is to true variola."

This is certainly a grand result, and he who accomplishes it will not only live in bronze and marble, but his name and fame will be graven upon the tablets of the human heart forever. There is no calculating the value of such a triumph over the obdurate and hitherto invincible scourge of the tropics. But it is a matter of grave scientific doubt whether this dread disease is produced by microbes or germs or spores at all; and the foundation for all this grandiloquent parade of blessed results is simply that there are some three or four hundred people in Mexico who "were inoculated before the last epidemic who passed through infected places without succumbing." And it was claimed that "there were none" who succumbed after inoculation, because "if no case was noticed there was none, for the desire is so great among many to find fault with the method."

I desire to quote three articles from the Medical and Surgical Journal of New Orleans upon this subject. They contain careful reviews of the methods of both Freire and Carmona, and although brought to the attention of the friends and advocates of this commission, have never been denied or attacked. It will be seen that they bristle with salient points upon which issue might have been joined, but the challenge has not been accepted nor the gauntlet picked up, although it has lain at the feet of the champions of this bill for three months.

FREIRE'S YELLOW-FEVER MICROBE.

Under the title of Doctrine Microbienne de la Fievre Jaune Dr. Domingos Freire, of Rio Janeiro, has published, in a large octavo volume of nearly 650 pages, the results of his researches upon the yellow-fever microbe, the cryptococcus xanthogenicus, together with his experiments in inoculating man and lower animals with his attenuated virus as a preventive against this dreaded disease. Notwithstanding the size of this book and its diffuseness on subjects of secondary importance, the author touches very lightly on subjects which we consider of prime importance, and he seems to have written more with the view of impressing the general public than to carry conviction to the minds of cool-headed scientific men. His work contains, we were going to say is adorned with, a number of very showy and highly colored plates, whose artistic finish is indeed very good, but which lack in the most essential point, clearness of detail, so that they fail to impart any clear conception of the cryptococcus and certainly fail to show the microbe in any of the yellow-fever tissues and organs. After a careful perusal of this book, we regret to state that Dr. Freire's investigations appear to us far from being as minute and exact as they should be, and fail to prove the assertions advanced by the author. This failure in our opinion can be attributed to many causes, the first of which is in the fact that, though Dr. Freire may be an excellent chemist, he is however lacking in sufficient pathological and microscopical experience and in a thorough knowledge of microbiology, all of which are indispensable to one engaged in researches of this nature. For instance, in his attempts at classifying his microbe he has followed the old classification of Robin, and has neglected altogether that of Cohn, which is the only one now admitted by scientists; had he followed this latter, he might have discovered that the cryptococcus xanthogenicus is more a fungus of the class saccharomyces than an alga; and did he possess more experience in pathology he certainly would not have dared to oppose the assertions of the most careful and eminent pathologists, among whom is Schmidt, of New Orleans, as to the character of black vomit, unless he could bring irrefutable proofs to the contrary. We regret that space will not allow us to enter into as minute a criticism of Dr. Freire's work as we would have liked to; we will, however, be satisfied in this article to point out some of the most glaring errors in his treatise, so as to justify the statements already made, reserving the right to return to the subject at some future time.

That Dr. Freire is dealing with a micro-organism admits of no doubt, for he has succeeded in isolating and cultivating it in what, from his description, must have been sterilized culture-grounds. But there is a long way between admitting the above and accepting the fact of the presence of this microbe in the blood and organs of living cases of yellow fever or believing it to be the cause of the disease. It is, indeed, immaterial whether the cryptococcus be present in vomited matter, bile, or urine, or in the blood after death, or in triturated organs, for the sources of external contamination in these instances are many. But what is of very great importance is its presence in the living blood; and however satisfied we may be that Dr. Freire understands the precautionary measures adopted by Pasteur and others for obtaining uncontaminated blood from living beings, and although he claims to have followed these directions, we know also that these examinations require so much care and delicate manipulation and are so often open to error, even in the hands of the most careful microscopists, that we are inclined to believe that with him some of these precautionary measures must have been neglected and the microbes been introduced from without. We base this assertion on the fact that, though Dr. Freire claims to have discovered the cryptococcus in the blood with as low a magnifying power as 750 diameters, the beautiful micro-photographs taken by the United States Yellow-Fever Commission in Havana, in 1879, with Zeiss 1-18 objective, magnifying from fifteen hundred to two thousand times, fail to show this organism in the blood taken from undoubted cases of yellow fever in the living subject. And, again, Dr. Schmidt, the pathologist of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, a most accurate and trustworthy microscopist, and who, perhaps, has had more experience in the examination of the blood and tissues of yellow-fever cases than any living pathologist, asserts most positively that he has never met this organism in uncontaminated specimens even after the most careful researches, undertaken at our request, at a quite recent date.

In the third chapter of his book, Dr. Freire states that the yellow coloration of the skin found in yellow-fever patients and the black color of the vomit derive their coloring not from the pigments of the bile and blood, but from materials secreted by the cryptococcus xanthogenicus; blood corpuscles being present in the ejecta only in such rare cases as are associated with hemorrhage from the stomach or other viscus. This statement is directly contradictory of that of the most competent authorities; it is, indeed, so ridiculous that its mere mention is sufficient to show how accurate a pathologist the doctor is, and how much reliance is to be placed in his microscopical examinations; for we know full well that the color of black vomit is due to the pigment of the blood, and that the presence of hematin crystals with or without red-blood corpuscles are the only means of distinguishing between it and the black vomit found in other diseases where the coloring is due to bile pigments. The description of the microscopic lesions in seven yellow-fever cases shows how very superficial his examinations are, for he passes rapidly over the changes in such organs as the heart, liver, kidney, stomach, intestines, in which are found the most characteristic lesions of the disease, and describes at great length fancied changes in the condition of the blood-vessels of the brain and pia mater, and the appearance of the lungs, all of which are due to simple congestion of those parts.

In his experiments on animals, to demonstrate the pathogenesis of the cryptococci, he is not more logical. The only domestic animals Dr. Freire has found susceptible to yellow fever are rabbits and guinea-pigs. Of course these same animals are found susceptible to all sorts of affections, so much so indeed that whenever experiments are to be performed to demonstrate the action of a drug or the pathology of a disease they are always selected as victims, and it is strange that with so much susceptibility their race is not yet extinct. Rabbits and guinea-pigs, then, he has inoculated with blood from yellow-fever cadavers and with that from animals which had died from inoculations, and in whose blood swarms of live cryptococci could be detected, and he has found that in a day or two, sometimes more, at other times less, and sometimes in the space of a few hours, and once in even less than an hour, death has resulted; the animal showing symptoms before death, and anatomical lesions at the autopsy, which could as well be attributed to septicæmia, or to the traumatism caused by the operation, as to yellow fever; but because he found an abundance of cryptococci in the blood and fluids, he concludes that the cause of death must have been the latter disease, forgetting that he assumes exactly what he is attempting to prove.

As to the protection of these same animals by inoculation or vaccination with his attenuated virus, his experiments are so few that it is much easier to believe that their preservation is more of a coincidence than to believe it to be due to the protecting influence of the vaccination. The same might be said of the vaccination in the human species, with this difference, that the partial protection, if any there be, might be due to the moral effect of the vaccination.

With regard to that part of the book which treats of the interpretation of the symptoms of yellow fever, upon the assumption of its parasitic origin, and of the antizymotic effect of the sodium salicylate on the cryptococcus, we need only say that it contains nothing either of scientific value or medical interest.

In concluding, we wish to assure our reader that in giving our opinion upon the value of Dr. Freire's work we have been actuated neither by preconceived notions nor by personal feelings, but have given a candid and honest opinion as to the value of a work which others, who perhaps have studied it less carefully, have been pleased to believe of some scientific and practical use.

CARMONA'S YELLOW-FEVER INOCULATIONS.

Through the courtesy of the author we have been able to examine and carefully study the work of Dr. M. Carmona y Valle, of Mexico. This book of about three hundred pages, written in French, was published at Mexico in the latter part of 1885; it contains the results in full of all of Carmona's experiments on the etiology and prophylaxis of yellow fever. The author is apparently an excellent clinician and a very good lecturer, and we find much to admire in his work; on the most essential points, however, we believe him to be altogether opposed to sound logic and accurate observation.

We may here state that we have not entered upon the study of this book with preconceived ideas or a biased mind. We are no opponents of the germ theory, and, though no enthusiasts, we look upon this theory as the only one offering a plausible explanation for many, if not all, infectious and contagious diseases, yellow fever included. We can not admit though, without closely scrutinizing the evidence, that one who sees a microbe when looking over pathological specimens has really discovered a pathogenic microbe, and much less that inoculation with attenuated and modified microbes must necessarily grant immunity from all varieties of germ diseases,

However much we may hope that in some near future a true preventive will be found against these dreaded scourges, and believing at the same time that prophylaxis in person, that is, vaccination or inoculation, apparently offers the most logical means for attaining this desirable end, we are not so blinded as to be prepared to accept as true all conclusions and deductions based on insufficient data or want of accurate observations, which can only serve to vulgarize and bring into discredit methods of investigation which give promise of ultimate success.

That Professor Carmona, notwithstanding his many other high attainments, is not particularly fitted for this kind of work is made evident in the very introduction of his book; for we learn there that his experience in yellow fever is very limited, living as he does in a locality where the disease does not originate, and that outside of three or four cases of yellow fever introduced into the city of Mexico he depends for his researches upon specimens sent to him from a distance or upon observations made by others. Even the descriptions of his methods are very meager and wanting in that minute accuracy which should characterize a subject of such importance. Indeed, the lecture form, in which he treats his subject seems to us to be more suitable for clinical teaching, and is quite objectionable where a subject of such scientific interest is being discussed.

As to his germ, the peronospora lutea, which he asserts to be so easily seen and recognized in all organs and fluids of yellow-fever cases, even when the preparations have been left exposed to the air for a considerable period of time, we have endeavored, but in vain, to detect it in a number of preparations of undoubted cases of yellow fever at our disposal. A peronospora having such distinctive characteristics and differing so widely from other fungi of the same family ought certainly to be easily detected, and could scarcely have been overlooked by investigators who have made a special study of microbiology. We may state candidly, that after carefully reading Dr. Carmona's work we feel assured that what he describes as different phases of evolution of a single microbe is really nothing else but a number of fungi belonging to different classes. The microphotographs accompanying this work do not give, by any means, a clear idea of the peronospora lutea; for they show no detail whatever, and seem to be merely made up of different masses of shadow and light.

Referring to our esteemed friend Dr. H. D. Schmidt, the pathologist of the Charity Hospital, Carmona gives the doctor due credit for being an accurate and competent observer and microscopist, and says that even such an anti-germist as Dr. Schmidt mentions in his work on yellow fever the fact of his having found a peronospore in one of his sections of the liver, and although Dr. Schmidt proves very conclusively to our mind that the fungus he saw had been introduced from without, Carmona brings forward this fact as a strengthening argument in favor of his theory, but he forgets to lay stress on this point, that the peronospore was only seen by Schmidt in a single section out of the upward of a thousand preparations of yellow-fever organs and fluids which he examined. A point which, it would be reasonable to suppose, ought to have led Carmona to abandon this fact altogether as more contradictory to his theory than otherwise.

The inoculations, notwithstanding the amount of ingenuity brought forward by their author to explain their salutary influence, confer no immunity from yellow fever, for of three hundred and eighty vaccinated soldiers garrisoned at Vera Cruz during the summer of 1885 twenty-six contracted the disease, and of this number seventeen died.

Before concluding we wish to call special attention to a paragraph in the appendix to Dr. Carmona's book. When speaking of the benefit conferred by his inoculation, among other facts proving the efficacy of his method, he states that by permission of the Mexican Government he was allowed to vaccinate over one hundred persons sent by Mexico to the World's Exposition at New Orleans during the winter of 1884-'85, and though these inoculated persons remained in our city until yellow fever had made its appearance among us, none of them contracted the disease. If all of the doctor's statistics are like the above, we can see how much importance is to be attached to them. We state most positively that for many months previous to, during, and after our world's fair there was not a single well-authenticated case of yellow fever in our city; besides, had the city been infected, he does not explain how it happened that without the benefit of inoculation the tens of thousands of strangers and the 225,000 inhabitants of New Orleans escaped the disease.

THE YELLOW-FEVER COMMISSION.

In our January number we carefully reviewed the work of Domingos Freire, and asserted that we thought it so devoid of all evidences of value as to make the sending of a commission to investigate the results of his labors the part of anything but wisdom.

In this issue we present an equally impartial and careful review of the evidence brought forward by Carmona to support his claim of having found the micro-organism productive of yellow fever and of having perfected a method for its protective inoculation. It will be seen that we have found nothing to make us change our former opinion. That opinion may be clearly and briefly stated thus:

Certain friends of ours, prominent among them Dr. Joseph Holt, the president of our State board of health, have asserted that in Mexico and South America a vast mass of evidence has been collected, indicating that the germ productive of yellow fever and a method of protective vaccination for the disease have been discovered. So important are these claims and this evidence, said our friends, that we think a commission should be erected by the Congress of the United States to examine into and report upon them. To this we replied: We have examined the claim of Drs. Freire and Carmona (having procured copies of their complete works) with candor and coolness, and find them, upon their own showing, so utterly devoid of all scientific value, that we regard it as both foolish and extravagant to expend upon their investigation one single cent of money.

Our friends answer: We have considered what you have said concerning Freire and Carmona and are constrained to admit that it is true, but our proposed commission is to have other functions than the mere investigation of these men's claims; this investigation is, indeed, the reason for the commission's being, but, once in the fever-haunted zones, it is to be empowered to make in the latest scientific mode full and complete investigations of its own into all the questions at issue.

That this is a perfectly fair statement of the case witness the courteous and complimentary letter of Dr. Holt, given at another page, and Senate bill 604, appended thereto.

Dr. Holt says in his letter that, with a sense of justice which has ever been the mainspring of his actions, he shall insist upon the names of Freire and Carmona occupying conspicuous places in the bill. We must confess that we fail utterly to see wherein consists the justice of making a set of experiments and results, admitted on all sides to be without value, the pretext for the formation of a scientific commission. Has not Dr. Holt misapplied this much-abused word?

The valueless nature of Freire's and Carmona's work being granted, then, and the futility of sending a commission to investigate it and the consequent injustice of making it the excuse for the sending out of a commission being established, what reason at all can exist for sending a commission at this season to investigate yellow fever? We are at a loss to say.

Remembering the commission of 1879, and its thorough but unsuccessful hunt for the germ, the only reason which suggests itself to our mind is that recent improvements in staining and culture methods foster the hope that the hunt may nowadays prove more successful. If this be the reason, it certainly strengthens our original position. We have maintained from the first, and still maintain, that we should send upon this errand not a commission, but a single man, Dr. Sternberg, a world-acknowledged expert in all that pertains to bacteriological lore and a physician of no small experience with yellow fever. Already in the employ of the United States, he might be sent on a man-of-war to the South, there to remain until he had thoroughly satisfied himself concerning the questions in dispute at no additional outlay to the General Government beyond that of his daily expenses.

This idea of attaching to the bacteriologist two physicians to examine and certify to the genuineness of every case upon which he is to pursue his investigations reminds us of the proposition made some years ago by the London Punch, that as all the qualities necessary for the detection, pursuit, and capture of a criminal were rarely found in an individual, all policemen should be sent out in bands of three; one of great mental development and with senses of exceeding acuteness to detect the criminal and plan his capture; a second of transcendent fleetness to overtake him; and a third of gigantic strength to overpower and subdue him. Has medicine reached such a pass that the pathologist can no longer recognize a disease save in stained and mounted preparations upon the stage of his microscope? Must all the game upon which he is about to bring his weapons to bear be set and flushed by a pack of clinical pointers? And supposing this to be necessary, assuming for the sake of argument that Dr. Sternberg does not know a case of yellow fever when he sees it, could he take with him from this country any one more thoroughly acquainted with the disease than the medical men of the countries to which he is going?

We would submit, too, that a single expert bound upon such a mission is apt to do more real scientific work than a commission consisting of several individuals. He is less beset by perturbing influences in the shape of public receptions, dinners, &c. Especially is this true of one belonging to the Government service and accustomed to feel responsible for a full and exact performance of his duties to the members and officers of that service.

It has been said that the public at large would feel more confidence in the verdict of a commission than in that of a single person. In this opinion we do not concur. France sent Brouardel to investigate Ferran and his swindling cholera inoculations, and not only all France but the whole world felt the most perfect confidence in the result of his investigations. Dr. Shakespeare is at this very time investigating on behalf of our Government all the facts connected with the late cholera epidemic in Spain. Does any one suppose that either the profession or the public will feel a lack of confidence in his report when made?

Having gone over the whole ground, then we say finally: Freire and Carmona are not worth investigating; there are no especial reasons for sending a commission at this time to South America; if any is to be dispatched upon such an errand it should be Dr. Sternberg, or any equally competent bacteriologist (preferably one already in the service of the United States, if such could be found), who should be permitted to remain until he had satisfied himself either that he had discovered the pathogenic microbe and a method of protective vaccination, or that these were not to be discovered by any of the means and methods at present known to science.

[The New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal for March 1886.]

THE YELLOW-FEVER COMMISSION.

Since our last issue the yellow-fever commission bill has been considered and passed upon by committees from both branches of Congress. Both committees agree that the commission shall consist of three members, appointed by the President, with the advice of the National Board of Health; two of the commissioners to be chosen from the medical officers now in the service of the United States and one from civil life. The House committee recommends that the entire expenditure be limited to $25,000. A minority of the same committee reserves the right to amend or oppose the bill as reported in the House of Representatives.

Having thoroughly discussed this matter for another month, having gone over in great part the works of Freire and Carmona, and having read and considered all that has been written in the daily press and elsewhere concerning this matter, we declare ourselves in sympathy with the minority. We disapprove of the bill as it now stands, and hope that the minority may succeed in further modifying it, for we have still to learn anything which would cause us to change our original opinion.

That opinion, it will be remembered, consisted of three propositions, which, together with all our reasons, we deem it well to lay once more clearly before our readers.

I. The researches of Freire and Carmona are valueless.

The truth of this assertion is proven:

(a) By their own accounts. In the careful reviews of their books contained in our January and February numbers we have pointed out examples of their errors of commission, which are many, and of omission, which are more. It is noteworthy that none of the advocates of the commission to investigate the labors of these gentlemen have called attention to a single misstatement in these reviews. In the article immediately preceding this we give further information concerning these researches in a series of extracts translated from the works in question.

(b) By the fact that the friends of the commission bill have not even attempted to adduce from Freire's or Carmona's books a single argument to show that their researches are of any value. The Mississippi Valley Medical Monthly (Memphis), the Atlanta Medical Journal, the Florida Medical and Surgical Journal, the Maryland Medical Journal, the Philadelphia Medical News, and the New York Medical Record are the only medical journals among our exchanges which have taken up the matter. The first four support the bill upon the strength of the vague reports concerning the researches of Freire and Carmona which have been circulated by the newspapers of the country for the past two or three months, and of the idea that it is commendable for Congress to appropriate money for any medical investigation. The Maryland Medical Journal, in an editorial, evidently written after a careful reading of our February leader, agrees with us substantially, and the Record takes the same view.

(c) We learn from an intelligent citizen of Mexico that Carmona has had but little experience with yellow fever, and this, indeed, he admits; that he has never ventured into fever-stricken localities, and that his assertions gain but little belief in Mexico. In corroboration of this statement we quote the following from the New York correspondence of The Daily Picayune of this city, a vehement advocate of the commission bill:

"Dr. John Bettini di Morsa, of this city, who was in charge of the San Sabastain Hospital at Vera Cruz three years, is familiar with Dr. Manuel Carmona y Valle's method of yellow-fever inoculation, but has no faith in it. Carmona bases his whole theory, according to his opinion, on the fact that the 'mushroom microbe' is found in the remains of all who die of yellow fever, whereas the truth is that they are found in the remains of all who die, no matter from what disease, in warm and unhealthy climates. Carmona has never allowed himself the proper opportunities for carrying on his studies, but has remained continually in the City of Mexico, where a case of yellow fever never occurs. The corpses upon which he experiments are transported from Vera Cruz, and by the time they reach his dissecting-room are not in a condition to permit of scientific and trustworthy research. So little confidence has he in his own method of inoculation that he has never ventured into Vera Cruz, which is well known to be the headquarters of yellow fever, and his theory is almost universally poohpoohed in Mexico. The commission to be appointed to investigate his theories will no doubt have a pleasant trip, but so far as science is concerned it will be merely grasping after wind. Should the members, however, go into the matter with thoroughness, they will in all probability succumb to the fiend they pursue."—N. O. Picayune, February 15.

II. Our second proposition was:

That the valueless nature of Freire's and Carmona's researches being readily established by a reading of their own books, it is either foolish or disingenuous to make idle rumors of their achievements a pretext for a scientific commission. As a matter of policy merely it is bad, for should our profession acquire among public men the reputation of asking the expenditure of money in reckless investigations of this and that, the time will surely come when Congress will refuse us its aid in the prosecution of some scientific work of genuine merit.

III. That if, as seems to be the case, the majority of the profession in the yellow-fever States desires the investigation of the disease according to the latest methods of Pasteur and Koch, we, though not sanguine as to the result, shall offer no opposition. We insist, however, in the name of common sense, that the Government should send upon this errand not a commission, but a single expert bacteriologist, accompanied if necessary by a trained assistant, and that he should be allowed to remain upon the ground until he has arrived at a definite conclusion one way or another. The bacteriologist should, if possible, be chosen from the medical officers now in the service of the Government; first, on the ground of economy; second, because his esprit de corps would act as a powerful incentive to conscientious industry. A commission is likely to accomplish less than a single man for several reasons. Responsibility is divided; there is opportunity for wrangling; it is more liable to sundry distractions. To investigate cholera, Germany sent Koch; France, Pasteur; we, Shakespeare; England, Klein and a co-worker with whom he was in perfect accord. Brouardel was sent by the French Government to look into the claims of Ferran, and the work of all these was accomplished cito et jucunde.

These criticisms have met with no refutation or reply during the months since their publication. Men who write letters and send hurrah resolutions are silent on these charges. All that is claimed for Carmona to justify this commission is "the degree of relative certainty which is necessary and sufficient to induce a practitioner to apply a recognized harmless means in a disease until now without remedy. It is said, "were it but a dream, but a hope, why not attempt it in a lost cause?"

This is certainly a most "lame and impotent conclusion." The Mexican habit of extravagant pronunciamentos at the beginning of a campaign of victories to be achieved which never materialize may have infected with its attenuated virus the scientific mind of that Republic and invaded with its braggadocio the fields of cold and accurate science. But these experiments will go on without the supervision of our commission. There is no intimation that Drs. Carmona and Freire are to cease effort in this glorious field. If they are great scientists, as the friends of this bill insist, they are abundantly competent to eliminate the truth. Then why should the American doctors insinuate, by sending a commission to oversee and inspect their work, that they are not capable of establishing it and accrediting it to the world. This bill is a proclamation that the medical world is dubious of the exactness and truth of these alleged discoveries.

If Carmona's theory is true it will fight its way through all the hosts of opposition, like Jenner's truth; results have verified it and established it in the minds of a large majority of the scientific world. No commission was necessary. So also with this. What is to prevent every doctor in New Orleans, or Memphis, or wherever else the scourge shall swoop upon its wings of saffron trying this experiment? Carmona will doubtless be ready to supply the world with the desiccated peronospora lutea.

The doctors of the world are not deaf and the tongue of Mexico is not dumb. She will proclaim her victory and the world will hear and heed. We do not need a commission to act as a messenger to transmit the news, and if we do, we have already in commission men who can do for us all that this commission could do. [Applause.]

They talk about expeditions to the north pole as precedents for this. The attempt of ill-judged enthusiasm for science, to wring from the obdurate and frozen death of the arctic circle some answer to the problems of science may have been as necessary, as it has been non-productive of good results. If the inhabitants who drink oil, eat tallow candles, and are clothed in furs under the lumen boreale had been capable of establishing the corner-stone, the scientific frontier under the north star, and the world had heard of it, it is imagined no commissions would have been sent to verify results, and the snows would not have drunk the blood of Franklin and his successors in a search for a northwest passage, or for the last fraction of a degree of the flattening of the earth at the poles, or any curiosity in geography, meteorology, or astronomy. [Applause.] There is perhaps a true analogy between an expedition to find Symmes's Hole [laughter] and a commission to hunt up scientific or medical ignes fatui in the tropics. Both may be true, for aught we know, and both have sponsors who vouch their existence and compurgators who stand with them at the bar of public opinion. So also as to the precedent to appropriate money to test the telegraph. That was a tangible, practicable experiment, vouched for by the probabilities of physical science. If Morse had had the money himself to have built the line between Washington and Baltimore and had transmitted three hundred messages over it (as Carmona has), where would have been the necessity of appropriating the money for a commission to have gone a gypsying to Baltimore to realize the dream?

It is said that this measure is avouched by the American Public Health Association and many medical men of eminence. Dr. Billings, I am informed, said to the Senate committee that there was about an even chance that the commission must fail. I would not be understood as casting any stigma upon eminent gentlemen who think there is necessity for this commission. But I demur to the pleading that seeks to close our mouths and eyes to the policy and necessity of a measure which involves considerable expense without a reasonable hope of practical benefit, and which (to grant its legality and necessity) can and will be obtained without a commission in other ways. I beg leave also to say that I do not understand the voice of the medical profession to be unanimously for the proposition. From a trustworthy source I beg leave to say the Medical and Surgical Association of Louisiana when it indorsed this bill was acting through not more than twenty members and no opponents of the bill were present, and few, if any, who had read the work of Freire or Carmona, and that the same motion to indorse this bill was defeated before the association some weeks afterward when a distinguished advocate of this bill was present.

The sole foundation for the idea that yellow fever is a disease that can be prevented by inoculation like small-pox seems to be that one attack of the fever gives immunity from further attacks.

But this is only true when the person once attacked continues to live in the yellow-fever district. If he should leave that district for any length of time and then return, his immunity is gone. He must be and remain acclimated in addition to the systemic subjugation to the disease.

The fever can not be developed in certain altitudes, and the city of Mexico, where Carmona lives and has made all his experiments, has never developed a case of yellow fever, although one of the filthiest cities in the world. All its yellow-fever patients were imported.

Upon this question the medical profession is not by any means a unit. There is a great diversity of opinion as to whether an attack of the yellow fever is a protection for the future; and to state that one attack gives future protection is certainly not to state the case as it is. It is to some extent a climatic disease, and it is true that one attack of yellow fever does not always prevent the recurrence of another—that is, if you are not acclimated.

Mr. KING. Just as much as any other disease.

Mr. CALDWELL. On that point Doctor KING and myself disagree. [Laughter.]

Now, to show you how utterly ridiculous the proposition is as to the effect of this mode of preventing attacks of yellow fever, a fact alleged to be true in this connection is this: That of the two hundred or four hundred people attending the New Orleans exposition that were inoculated not one of them died. That is the statement made in support of this point. The fact is, that during that exposition there was not a well-authenticated case of yellow fever in the city; not one during that whole time; and the fact that none of the three hundred or four hundred people who were inoculated died may be offset by the further statement that of the two hundred and twenty thousand people who went from this country and all parts of the civilized world to that exposition not one of them died from that disease; and yet, Mr. Chairman, it is just upon such data as that that we are to rush into the craze on this subject of inoculation. Why, some of these men inflicted with this species of rabies ought to be sent to Pasteur at once. It is the only way to rid them of the disease. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption on this point?

Mr. CALDWELL. I must decline to be interrupted, for I have no time.

Mr. DAVIS. With reference to this New Orleans question simply?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have not the time to yield.

Now, Dr. Billings said before a Senate committee, if I may be permitted to allude to what occurred there, when asked the direct question by Senator HARRIS, that the chances of this commission resulting in an utter failure were about equal to the chance of its achieving anything in the way of success.

Now, shall we go off in the craze which seems to prevail on the inoculation theory for the prevention of disease and appropriate $25,000 or more in advance of a reasonable prospect of benefit from it? If we challenge this bill, as faithful sentinels on the picket line around the national Treasury we certainly have warrant for it in the dissent of medical men of approved skill and capacity and position. [Applause.]

It is not, of course, intended to reflect on the motives of any gentleman whose zeal for science and humanity may lead him to join any forlorn hope against the citadel of this terrible foe to human life, nor is it, we suppose, necessary to disclaim any participation in the quarrels that may divide and distract the counsels of the medical faculty, for kindly be it said that medicine has more dissensions than "wars or women have" [laughter and applause], but the sole object is to present such reasons as seem sufficient to defeat the creation of a useless commission and prevent the incurring of a needless expenditure of the public money.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, but I will make only one in regard to the first and chief objection that he urges that these experiments prove nothing in regard to the existence of the microbe. Suppose they do not, and I place but little value upon the judgment of the New Orleans newspapers from which he quotes as against the almost unanimous opinion of the medical profession; but suppose they do not. It does not touch the question at all. We may not discover for years, we may never discover, the precise form of the microbe which produces the yellow fever, but we may prove positively that it is an inoculable disease. The particular organism which produces small-pox has never yet been discovered. Then the main portion of the gentleman's remarks, upon which he has expended all the luxuriance of his wit and humor and imagination, is simply an attack upon the scientific nomenclature, which will apply equally well to the whole circle of sciences. I admit these terms are, perhaps, ridiculous. But would the gentleman apply Christian names, and call them Jacob, Moses, Abraham? Or do they deserve to be even called Beelzebub? I think the gentleman might as well leave his satanic majesty alone.

I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope that will not be done. I desire to speak on the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Virginia wishes to debate the bill he may do so. There has been no limit fixed to the debate. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] can move that the committee rise; but he can not move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House when a gentleman is on the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. There was no one on the floor when the motion was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia now announces his intention to debate the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. DAVIS. This is a question of the defeat or the safety of the bill, a question that is to be decided within the next three minutes. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to let us have a vote.

Mr. KING. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will stand by his motion.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TUCKER. Is not this bill, in its hearing before the Committee of the Whole, entitled to be read by sections and debated under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The debate thus far has been merely the general debate.

Mr. TUCKER. Then how can the gentleman from Massachusetts move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair has stated, the gentleman from Massachusetts can make the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. TUCKER. But can he couple it with the motion that the committee report the bill favorably to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, until the five-minute debate has been entered upon.

Mr. DAVIS. I make the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5542) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the truth of alleged discoveries of the specific cause of yellow fever, and of a method of preventing that disease by inoculation, and to obtain all information possible as to the cause and prevention of that disease, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to one minute.

The SPEAKER put the question on the motion to limit debate, and had called for the affirmative vote.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend so as to make the time one half-hour.

Mr. KING. That is too late. The vote was being taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion to amend was made too late.

The House divided; and there were—ayes, 69; noes, 17.

Mr. TUCKER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 2397) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3775) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase an additional strip of ground on the east side of the United States court-house and post-office building at Fort Wayne, Ind., to be paid for out of the appropriation already made; and

A bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes providing for additional pay for postal cars; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. HEPBURN, as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars," in line 1023, the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission."

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose last evening it was dividing by tellers on the amendment. The tellers, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], will resume their places.

Mr. WILLIS (one of the tellers). It is agreed that a vote in the House shall be had on this amendment, and the point as to a quorum is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The point as to a quorum having been withdrawn, the "noes" have it, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to strike out the last word. When, on account of the lateness of the hour last evening, the debate upon this paragraph was suspended some statements had been made in regard to the improvement of the Missouri River which I wish to notice. The strong point was that at present there was no commerce upon the Missouri River, and an inference was drawn by several gentlemen that therefore the attempt to make an appropriation for the improvement of the river was not only inexpedient but was more than inexpedient; that it partook of the character of a fraud upon the Treasury. As to the extent of the present commerce upon that stream, I think that the statement made yesterday is in the main correct. The commerce to-day is not at all in proportion with the character and capacity of the stream.

Yet that raises the question why it has no such proportionate commerce to-day. How does it happen that a stream which is navigable 2,500 miles above Saint Louis is without commerce? The fact may arise from either of two causes: First, from the character of the stream; and my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in speaking of it yesterday said that at low water its channel was very narrow, while at high water the floods overwhelmed its banks and frequently cut off large portions of them. That is true. But the same is true of the Mississippi River, and will be found true of every stream which runs through a soil deep, rich, and friable. What is here alleged in regard to the Missouri in that particular will, I fancy, be found true in the main of the Mississippi, and therefore, if it be impolitic or inexpedient to improve the Missouri for that reason, then for precisely the same reason it is equally unwise to improve the Mississippi. But that is not the chief cause why there is so little commerce on the Lower Missouri to-day. The chief cause will be found in this, that by the construction of railways and by the movement of freights from West to East, and by the pooling of those railroads and their absorption and control of business, freights which would otherwise go by the river now go by rail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, was recognized, and yielded to Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am much obliged. Now, Mr. Chairman, this being the fact, the question presenting itself to this committee is whether, looking to the future population that will occupy the vast area which is drained by the Missouri, and looking to the cheapening of transportaion, it is now expedient to improve the navigation of that river. And what are the facts? The fact to-day is that the two railroads from Kansas City to Saint Louis on both banks of the river are owned and controlled by Mr. Gould, and constitute a valuable part of the Gould system. The fact is that the freight rates are maintained at such a point as to constitute a tax upon the farmers and shippers, which, as has already been demonstrated by the experiment of transporting grain on the Missouri River, is an onerous tax. The case cited yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. WILLIS], and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is precisely in point.

In 1878 there was a shipment made from Kansas City to Saint Louis by barge line of some 208,000 bushels of grain, and the difference between the charges for transportation by rail and the cost of shipment by water was, on corn 2½ cents a bushel and on wheat 7½ cents a bushel; making a difference of $8,537 on a shipment of 208,516 bushels of grain. If you take the crop moved in the year 1879 between Kansas City and Saint Louis, and compute the difference between the cost of moving that amount of freight by the river and moving it by rail, you will find a difference of $14,042,243, as the saving by water transportation as compared with rail transportation upon the crop of one year alone. It will be further seen by the figures which were given by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that a saving would be made on the grain shipped from Sioux City to Saint Louis of $28,000,000—more than four times the estimated cost of improving that river, because the estimate of the engineer is that the river can be improved for $10,000 per mile. There is no railroad built for $10,000 per mile, but for that sum per mile you can make a water way which will save to the people of the great grain region of this continent millions and millions of dollars every year. Now, while it may be true, and is true, that the volume of commerce to-day upon the Missouri is small, that is simply because of your railways. The problem is whether, by making this improvement, you can cheapen the cost of transportation, and as to that there can be no question whatever.

There is this further point to be noticed, Mr. Chairman. The great desire of our brethren in the East is to have the entire commerce of the continent centered at New York, or at points upon the Eastern seaboard; and for that reason, so long as the present railroad system can be maintained, they might be, in a purely local sense, justified in opposing the opening up of water routes to the Gulf. But take the standpoint of the West, the standpoint of the man who raises this grain and who is entitled to have the profit which now goes for this costly railway transportation; from that standpoint there is no appropriation in this bill, there is no enterprise proposed to this House which, in my judgment, is more meritorious or more deserving than a wise, broad scheme of improvement for the Missouri River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert the following extract from the official report of the Missouri River convention:

Could we successfully employ barges on the Missouri River between Kansas City and Saint Louis alone, so as to realize this saving in the cost of marketing our crops, it would make a vast difference to the people of the Missouri Valley. On the wheat and corn crops of this section for 1879, the latest for which we have exact figures, these savings of 7½ and 2½ cents per bushel, respectively, would have made a total saving for that year alone of $14,042,243—being in one year on two cereals on only the 400 miles between Kansas City and Saint Louis an actual saving of nearly twice the estimated cost of improving the whole 800 miles from Sioux City to Saint Louis. Could we employ barges on the Missouri River between Kansas City and Sioux City it would make an annual saving equal to that here shown between Kansas City and Saint Louis and would be in addition thereto. Or could we employ barges from Sioux City to Saint Louis to move our crops, the saving in the cost of marketing one crop like that of 1879 would be double that shown above or four times the estimated cost of improving that much of the river.

From the facts disclosed by the experimental fleet of 1878, and from a knowledge of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers derived from a long experience with them, Captain Lowery, who had charge of the Babbage Company's fleets in 1878, arrived at the conclusion that, with adequate improvement of these rivers, grain can be carried from Kansas City to New Orleans at a freight charge of 7 cents per bushel. It is believed that a corresponding rate from all other Missouri River points, and 3 cents added for the higher costs of ocean freightage to foreign markets from New Orleans than from Atlantic ports, would not exceed 12 cents per bushel, making the grain available for export from New Orleans at the same charge as from Atlantic ports.

The current rail rates for years past from Missouri River points to Atlantic ports has not been less than 21 cents on wheat and 16 cents on corn—a difference of 4 cents on corn and 9 cents on wheat in favor of the river route. The price of grain in the Missouri Valley is the price in foreign markets less the cost of placing it there. The price in foreign markets is fixed by the supply from countries other than our own, hence this saving, if realized, as it may be by the improvement of our rivers, will inure to the producers in the Missouri Valley, and will apply to the entire product of our farms, as well as to that part exported.

The product of the Missouri Valley in the census year 1879, the last for which we have accurate statistics, was 61,116,377 bushels of wheat and 414,349,526 bushels of corn. These crops at 4 and 9 cents respectively give a total sum of $22,074,456, which river transporation would save to the producers of the Missouri Valley on each crop like that of 1879.

We have to consider, however, not alone the benefits that may be secured, but the dangers that may be averted. The high cost of transportation in this country, maintaining as it does the high cost of American grain in foreign markets, and the reduced cost of transportation from grain-producing countries in Asia incident to the opening of the Suez Canal, reducing as it does the cost of grain from those countries delivered in the same market, has so stimulated their product that they threaten soon to drive American grain from all markets accessible to both, and to so reduce the profit of its production in the Missouri Valley as to depress our agricultural industries and compel the adoption of other products. The contest between American grain and that of other countries for primacy in the world's market is now reduced to a matter of transportation. The advantages are now against us, but the improvement of our water ways will turn this permanently in our favor. These facts now present a dangerous and threatening situation, and the improvement of our river, as a means of promoting cheaper transportation for our grain than railroads can afford, is demanded not merely as a means for securing great benefits, but likewise as a means of averting great disasters. And it is in the interest of not only securing benefits but averting disasters that this appeal to you is made.

The practicability of the improvement of our river is no longer a matter of doubt. The success of the jetties and other improvements on the Mississippi River is well and generally known. Experiments on the Missouri River, both by private and corporate enterprise, and by Government appropriations, have demonstrated that this stream also can be easily and cheaply improved.

After careful survey and adequate study of the river, Maj. Charles R. Suter, then engineer of the United States Army and member of the Mississippi River Commission, now president of the Missouri River Commission, reported to Congress in 1881 that an expenditure of $10,000 per mile would secure a permanent channel of 12 feet depth at low water, and of sufficient width for purpose of navigation. This sum does not exceed half the cost of a single-track railroad, and will present transportation facilities equal to all the railroads in the valley combined.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, withdrew his pro forma amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking my friend a question, if he will permit.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it is true that by this barge system of transportation 50 per cent. of the cost of moving the products of that region may be saved, as was stated here yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], why is it that the barge system is not in use? There is the river; there are the barges; why do you not use them? If by the mere threat to use them the railroad companies can be compelled to surrender one-half of their freight charges, why is not that threat resorted to every year and every month? The truth is, gentlemen, there is nothing in it. It is like some of these other statements that are made from time to time without proper foundation. It is like the talk we heard about the immense quantities of freight to go down that river. There is comparatively little. It is not the direction that freight naturally seeks; and even if the river were improved so that freight might readily go down, there would be, in my humble judgment, little to go. Gentlemen forget the obstacle there is in that almost irresistible current. Here is my colleague who took a pleasure trip on that river from Saint Joseph to Council Bluffs, a distance of a little over 200 miles, which is made by rail in five hours; yet he was precisely five days in making the journey! The commissioners in trying to get up the river were over thirty days with their boats in getting from Saint Louis up to the city of Bismarck; and, as I said yesterday, when they moved their plant from the vicinity of Saint Louis up to Kansas City their steamboats were more than three months in moving the comparatively meager plant belonging to the commission.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Can my friend tell us how many days it would take to come down the stream? The freight mostly comes down, I take it.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is not the saving that one would suppose, because, by reason of the difficulties attending navigation, the boats must tie up as soon as it becomes dark.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know—every man familiar with the commerce of the Missouri River knows—that a boat laden with freight goes from Saint Louis to Kansas City in four days?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not know it.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. It is a fact. I supposed everybody knew it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, that is a distance of a little over 300 miles in four days. There is no great cheapness in that, it seems to me.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will read the document already presented he will see why this appropriation is asked.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman can get any kind of document he pleases.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman can make any statement he pleases.

Mr. HEPBURN. There are certain professional gentlemen who live off these improvements, and who are ready to furnish any facts or any class of facts which gentlemen may want, and tabulate them, too, if necessary.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman also can tabulate. I think those statements are as good as his.

Mr. REED, of Maine. These men never work themselves out of a job, either.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to amend by striking out the last word. In reply to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], I wish to say that the engineers who have made the examination of the Missouri River report that it can easily be made navigable at an expenditure of $10,000 a mile. That, of course, includes the control of the current and the rapidity of the current.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did the gentleman say that this was the report of the commission?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It is the report of the engineers, I take it. Is it not?

Mr. HEPBURN. One member of the commission, at one time an engineer, made that statement; but the same officer, who prepared this report as I assume, refuses to say as a member of the commission what the cost will be. He refuses to say that specifically in two reports that he has made since he became a member of the commission.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is immaterial to me whether the cost will be $10,000 or $20,000 a mile. I wish to suggest to my friend from Iowa that within twenty-five years there will be fifty million people living west of the Mississippi River. At that time those fifty millions of people, instead of sending their produce by rail across the continent, will send it to the Gulf. While what the gentleman states is to-day correct, that these barge lines are not running for the reason that this grain is not taken from New Orleans by ocean vessels, yet the time will come, and come soon, when ocean vessels from that point will find freights in the products of this vast Missouri and Mississippi basin, enabling them to carry grain perhaps as cheaply as it is now carried from New York. And even to-day they can carry it at an extra cost of but 3 cents a bushel.

I ask gentlemen to look into the future a little—to look ten years ahead, twenty years ahead—in providing for these great improvements, and from that standpoint to determine whether the people of the West, the people who raise the grain of this country and its meat, those States interested in the navigation of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, whether these populations, to-day great, in the future to be much greater and more dense, are not worthy to have consideration in the effort to construct water ways or to furnish water ways for the interstate commerce of the future. Ah! My friend from Maine [Mr. REED] smiles; but just as the East, decade after decade, has lost its vote upon this floor, so in the decades to come will it continue to lose. In other words, population is going West; the day will come when the people west of the Mississippi River will have their own water ways, will have their own Fourth of Julys as a part of the great Fourth of July of this whole nation; but they will be something more than simply a mere annex to the great cities and ports on the Atlantic coast.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. My impression is that the gentleman from Kansas misunderstood my smile. It arose from the fact that he inadvertently spoke of "constructing water ways"—accidentally stating the real situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. At that moment I was thinking of some logging streams up in the State of Maine. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, $28,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said with reference to these river conventions, and the weight which their proceedings should have with this body, that I wish to call attention to the fact that the great Missouri River convention held at Kansas City, Mo., on the 29th and 30th of December of last year was attended by thirty-three persons all told outside of the States of Kansas and Missouri. Kansas and Missouri were all there, but the delegates from all those localities, and anybody could go who wanted to as a delegate, were thirty-three in number.

Now, as a sample of the gravity and deliberation indulged in, I wish to read a brief extract from the report:

General CRAIG. I do not know what you have on your table to attend to, but I desire to say that we have a couple of ex-attorney-generals of the State of Missouri, each of whom could make a rattling speech of about two minutes. Here is General H. C. Ewing, and a good many of us, I know, would like to hear what he has to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Will General Ewing favor us with the remarks called for?

General EWING. I move that we appoint a committee of three to take General Craig down to the river—the Missouri River—and there throw him in and drown him.

There may have been some doubt as to whether there was water enough in that stream to drown anybody if he had not mentioned it. [Laughter.]

General CRAIG. Be careful how you spout around; that motion is out of order. Ask the chairman if it aint.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you hear a second to that motion?

Again, I read from another part:

General CRAIG, of Saint Joseph. I couldn't make a speech if I wanted to to-day, and I desire to say that the president of the board of trade of my city is present, and he is a lively young cuss, too, in the way of making a speech. My mayor is here. I am only here as a silent looker-on in the convention.

This is a part, and a fair sample, of the grave and deliberate manner in which this august assemblage treated this most important question of the improvement of the Missouri River. Everybody there looked upon it as a broad, roaring farce.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it may be, and possibly is, unfortunate that there are some men living in the Missouri Valley who attend river and harbor conventions and who are not as fastidious in the choice of elegant expressions as would come up to the literary standard set by my classical friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. But I will say to the gentleman that those of us who have lived in Missouri for the last quarter of a century know General James H. Craig, of the city of Saint Joseph. It is a name not unknown to the gentleman from Iowa. His name is a household word in my State. I undertake to say that although he may at times indulge in levity not becoming the dignity of a river and harbor convention, which so shocks my friend from Iowa, yet, sir, no man in Western Missouri has given more of energy, more of ability, to develop the great West than General James H. Craig, of the city of Saint Joseph, who used the term "lively cuss."

I think, sir, the gentleman from Iowa if he were in a foreign country and should attempt to defend the Congress of the United States, one who was inclined to be critical could readily find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD speeches less dignified, less decorous, and no more classical than that made by the gentleman from Saint Joseph in the river and harbor convention in the city of Kansas. Few, if any, in this Chamber have more culture or more intelligence than General Craig.

But the gentleman says there were only thirty-three delegates in attendance on the river and harbor convention at Kansas City outside of the States of Missouri and Kansas, and that Missouri and Kansas were all there. To that convention, if my memory serves me right, the States to participate were the States of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Dakota and Montana. I am simply giving the fact. Many, the gentleman one of them, were conspicuous by their absence. Many wrote letters and declarations that they were in favor of all honest appropriations for the improvement of the great highways of the country—yes, who said they were in favor of all honest improvement.

Did the gentleman himself in his letter to that convention say one word to those deluded people who met there, the tax-payers, the men who represented the wealth of the Missouri Valley—did the gentleman by word or act say, "Your convention is a fraud; your river is a fraud; it is not susceptible of navigation, and never can be made so?" Nothing of the kind.

The question again is asked by the gentleman from Iowa of the gentleman from Kansas, Why do you not run your barges on the Missouri River? The gentleman's candor will compel him to admit the reason the barges were abandoned on the Missouri River was because of the shifting channel of the stream, which we are attempting and hoping to remedy by the appropriation asked for that river. The day has passed when we ship our grain or provisions in packages. The grain of our great Missouri River Valley to-day must be removed in bulk. You can not put it in sacks and ship it, and it can only be removed in bulk by the use of barges on that stream.

And it is said, the assertion of the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding, by men who have spent their entire lives in running the steamboats on this dry-land stream, as he styles it, that it is susceptible of improvement, and that the appropriation asked for can be economically expended. The Missouri River Commission is doing good work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will go on now with this bill in a business-like way. These side issues do not touch the bill, and I appeal to gentlemen to let us go on at once and conclude it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking consent to embody in my remarks a certain document here.

Mr. WILLIS. Privilege has already been given under the general order to print on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; out of which sum $50,000 are to be expended at Grand Chain in extending the upper dike down stream and removing rocks and other obstructions to navigation at that locality; also $20,000 may be expended in constructing or aiding in the construction of such an embankment on the south side of the Great Miami River, near its junction with the Ohio, as may be necessary to confine the waters of the Great Miami in great floods to the general course of its channel at or near the Ohio, to the end that the formation of the bar in the Ohio River now forming and obstructing navigation may be arrested; also $30,000 of said appropriation shall be expended in constructing four ice-piers, pursuant to the plans of the Chief of Engineers, at or near the following places, to wit: One at Pomeroy, Ohio; one at Middleport, Ohio; one at Gallipolis, Ohio; and one at Ironton, Ohio: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to obtain, without cost to the United States, if it can be done, perpetual leases or conveyances of the riparian rights of the property-owners at each of said localities, in the event said ice-piers, or any one of them, shall be located where there is no improved landing place: And provided further, That at localities where there are improved landings he shall first obtain a relinquishment of wharfage rights and dues in favor of water craft seeking protection from damage by ice; and no part of this appropriation shall be used for such purpose until the foregoing conditions are complied with. Also, out of said appropriation for the Ohio River $5,865 shall be used in operating and keeping in repair the Davis Island dam; and hereafter the Secretary of War is authorized to make requisitions from time to time on the Secretary of the Treasury for such sums as may be necessary to operate and keep in repair the works at the Davis Island dam, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Also, out of said appropriation for the Ohio River $25,000 for removing obstruction at the mouth of Licking River.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Insert after the word "obtain," in line 1046, the words "if he can do so;" and strike out, in line 1047, after the words "United States," the words "if it can be done."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also, in line 1067, after the word "river," add "also, $15,000 for completing ice-harbor at Four-Mile Bar, near Cincinnati.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I offer the amendment I send to the desk by direction of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1032, after the word "twenty" insert "five," so that it will read "$25,000."

Mr. WILLIS. That is correct. It does not enlarge the amount appropriated by the bill, but simply sets aside an additional amount of that already allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. In line 1030, I move to strike out after the words "Grand Chain" all the remainder of the sentence, being the words "in extending the upper dike downstream and."

This is done on the recommendation of the engineer in charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. In line 1040, after the word "dollars," insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

This is also upon the recommendation of the engineers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. In line 1056, beginning with the word "also," I move to strike out all that follows down to and including line 1064.

I do that upon the statement of the engineer that it is already provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1040, after the word "thirty," insert "seven;" and after the word "thousand," in the same line, insert "five hundred;" and strike out the word "four" in line 1041 and insert "five." In line 1045, after the word "Ohio," insert "and one at or near Ashland, Ky., on the south side of the Ohio River."

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no objection to the amendment, I think.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope none will be made. None ought to be made.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to be compelled to say that there is objection. The difference between this addition and the other four which are provided in the bill is, that for the others we have the recommendation and estimates of the engineers. For this one in my own State we have not as yet any recommendation, and for that reason only I am compelled to object.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my colleague from Kentucky feels obliged to object to this modest proposition. The engineer has placed four ice-piers upon the north bank of the Ohio River in that locality and has not placed one upon the south bank. One bank is just as visible to the engineer's eyes as the other, and this is one of the best places for an ice-pier upon the Ohio River.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the object of constructing this pier?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The object of an ice-pier is to turn the ice away from a harbor in which water craft of all kinds, barges and other water craft, can shelter themselves from floating ice. At Ashland there is a long bend curving to the south above the city, with a mile or more of deep water, allowing vessels to moor close to shore, and when the ice comes down the Ohio it runs around a bend and over toward the Ohio shore, and nature has already done a great deal to form there at Ashland an ice-harbor. It is a very important harbor upon the Ohio River, with a flourishing commerce. Two coal railroads come to the river at that point. There are furnaces there, and a rolling-mill and a nail factory and a very important commerce at that harbor, indeed; while the craft which seek refuge in the harbor are often desolated by floating ice.

Now, this bill puts $30,000 for four ice-piers upon the other side of the river along some 65 miles of that shore, and my friend from Ohio upon this river and harbor committee [Mr. GROSVENOR], very familiar with the wants of that part of the Ohio River, recommends the necessity of this amendment; but my colleague, under the scruples he feels as a member of Congress from the State of Kentucky, does not like to appear here as favoring this amendment.

But since it makes no addition to the appropriation, and only recognizes that there are two banks to the Ohio River, and since four ice-piers are provided on the north bank, it puts but one on the south bank at a point where it is very much needed, and where the good it will accomplish will be visible to any fair eyes. I do hope my amendment will be accepted. I do not know what hope I ought to cherish when my colleague opposes it; but I have my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], a member of that committee, recognizing its importance, and he is prepared to say to the committee it ought to be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague perfectly understands my position in this matter. I am here as the mouth-piece of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and he certainly would not expect me to do toward my own State what I would not do toward another. I certainly would be unworthy of this place if I allowed any discrimination in favor of my own State.

My colleague knows the only objection to this is that this ice-pier has not been recommended by the engineer. I do not say the engineer would not recommend it, but his attention has not yet been called to it. If my colleague had called the attention of the engineers to this I have no reason to suppose it would not have been recommended, because on his statement it appears to be a place admirably adapted for an ice-harbor at a small expense, and the provision, as he suggests, does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then on the merits it appears it should go in.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Was this considered in the committee?

Mr. WILLIS. It was not, for the reason that no report was presented to the committee.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the committee will adopt this amendment. I think there could not be a more meritorious amendment offered to this bill. As a general rule, I have stood by the bill as reported by the committee. There was one matter, the appropriation for the improvement of the Big Sandy River, which I thought should be increased; but because of the fact that the bill was enormous in its amount, and because of the disposition of the House to stand by the bill as reported, I would not ask an increase of appropriation for the improvement of Big Sandy, notwithstanding that I thought it was due to that river that more than $40,000 should be appropriated. It was perfectly plain that the committee would not increase the amount appropriated in the bill to any river, hence I thought it useless to delay and endanger the bill by any amendment; but when it comes to this amendment the case is different. It does not increase the amount appropriated in the bill. The other matter did. The fact of there being so admirable a location for an ice-harbor at Ashland, Ky., ought to commend this amendment to every gentleman of the committee. I do not think that any man interested in the ice-harbor at that place is responsible for the engineer's failure to report in favor of the erection of an ice-harbor there.

But I think a man who would undertake to survey or observe the Ohio River with the view of locating ice-harbors, and who should have located all of them on one side of the river, or who should have passed this point without observing it as a place of all others the most practicable for the erection of a proper ice-harbor for boats on the Ohio River, must have been one-eyed or blind.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There are two ice-harbors on the south side of the river.

Mr. TAULBEE. Even without making this provision, the place my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] has asked to be inserted in the bill is one of the best natural ice-harbors on the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Louisville. All the boats running on the Big Sandy seek shelter at this point, notwithstanding there never has been any improvement to add to the protection which nature affords them from the ice to which they are subjected in the winter season.

Mr. FARQUHAR. To bridge over the difficulty in the suggestion made by the chairman with regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH], I move to amend, in line 1042, by inserting after the word "the" the words "present or prospective," so that it will read, "Pursuant to the present or prospective plans of the Chief of Engineers." Thereby latitude would be given for this proposed ice-pier at Ashland. I join with others who know the river in the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky that this deserves to be placed in this bill.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I object to the amendment which has just been submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], by which it is proposed to put into the bill the word "prospective," authorizing this House to deal with matters of improvement not provided for by any existing plan, but only in anticipation of a plan. That I submit is a new kind of legislation not authorized by any precedent and very liable to be abused.

I understand the chairman of the committee to have objected to this particular proposition submitted by the Representative from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH], because he understands, as I suppose, that it infringes a rule which has been adopted that we make no appropriation for any proposed improvement unless we have some recommendation of it from an engineer. As a general rule of administration I adopt that and agree with the gentleman that it is wise. But it appears to me in the case before us we are justified in making the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, because it does not enlarge the appropriation and it does not extend the scope of the appropriation which concerns itself generally with the Ohio River.

And therefore, being within the general scope of the appropriation, to wit, the improvement of the Ohio River, I think we can well accept the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] without infringing the rule which we have adopted in respect to appropriations. I therefore hope that that amendment will be received by the committee, and that the other amendment, to wit, authorizing an appropriation in anticipation of the plan, will be rejected.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand that line 1040 of this bill has been so amended as to authorize the appropriation of whatever may be necessary to complete these piers.

Mr. WILLIS. Then the gentleman misunderstands. The engineer reports that it may not require $30,000, and therefore the provision has been amended so as to appropriate $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CLARDY. Then I understand it is proposed to make an additional pier.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the proposition of my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH], which is now pending.

Mr. CLARDY. Is it proposed to appropriate the whole amount for the completion of these piers this year?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARDY. If so, why do the Committee on Rivers and Harbors adopt in this case a different rule from the one adopted in other cases?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know of any difference.

Mr. CLARDY. In other cases you give a percentage of what is estimated as necessary; in this case you propose to give all that is required, even if it be $500,000.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The whole amount appropriated here is $30,000, and the engineer does not think that even all of that sum will be needed.

Mr. CLARDY. Then you leave the $30,000 in the appropriation?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARDY. I understood otherwise.

Mr. WILLIS. I knew the gentleman was mistaken.

The amendment proposed by Mr. FARQUHAR was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. WADSWORTH; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing operations upon the reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, $50,000: Provided, That in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers the expenditure of this appropriation and the ultimate completion of this part of the reservoir system will adequately improve navigation.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the provision in this bill is inherited from a committee of which I was once a member, and I have no objection to the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that I did not have to the action of that committee of which I was a member. For this item there has been appropriated $585,000 on an estimate of $1,809,000 and a fraction. The theory is that it is for the purpose of building reservoirs to improve the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River. The Mississippi River drains 2,000,000 square miles. The country drained by these reservoirs would be about 18,000 miles. I have never believed, and do not believe now, that under any possible arrangement the time can ever come when these reservoirs could turn water enough into the Mississippi at its low stage to raise it half an inch at the Des Moines rapids. But I will tell you what this will do: it will furnish a convenience for floating logs (there is a good deal of pine up there); it will furnish very fine water-power, and it will be very cheap for the owners if the Government furnishes it for them. This appropriation will accomplish these objects, and these are the only objects that can be accomplished by it. I think, therefore, it would be a good service to strike this item from the bill, and I now move to strike it out.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has guarded with great care the very point upon which the gentleman rests his objection, by inserting, as a condition upon which the expenditure is to be made, a proviso "that in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers the expenditure of this appropriation and the ultimate completion of this part of the reservoir system will adequately improve the navigation." In other words, the engineer is not authorized to expend this money unless in his opinion it will accomplish the very object which the gentleman from Texas doubts it will accomplish.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, we invoke the opinion of the Secretary of War as to whether this appropriation will improve navigation. He can be in possession of no information which we are not in possession of if we take these reports, and I would let this House exercise its own judgment and not refer to somebody else.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Has the effect of th ese reservoirs upon navigation been tested upon the Upper Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIS. My understanding and information is that it has been tested upon the Upper Mississippi, and that the effect has been to increase the depth of water very considerably. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. GILFILLAN] is, I believe, familiar with the facts, and so are the gentlemen from that part of the country. The information of the committee was to the effect I have stated.

Mr. GILFILLAN. I know that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] does not desire to convey a wrong impression with reference to what has been already accomplished by only a partial construction of the system of reservoirs on the head waters of the Mississippi and the results thus far of the experiments in this direction, and for his information and for the information of the House I wish to state certain facts. It is true that the amount appropriated thus far has been only about $500,000. That is a small part of the original estimate of nearly two millions, but it has gone to the extent of accomplishing the building of three reservoirs on the upper waters of the Mississippi and the partial completion of several others.

The result of this has only been known during the last season of navigation; and this result, by the observation of the engineer, who communicated the matter to me in person just before I came to Washington at the present session, has been such as to produce in the Mississippi River from Saint Paul to Lake Pepin an additional depth of 1½ feet in the channel of the river during the stage of low water and while the reservoirs were being operated by the discharge of water therefrom. I will state further, as a matter within my own observation and as a matter of common remark among the people, that for the first time in many years the largest boats used in navigating the river to Saint Paul during the highest stages of water were enabled by the aid of these reservoirs to reach there during the entire season of navigation of 1885, including the dry season, the season of low water.

I make this statement because I know the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] did not intend to leave a wrong impression upon this House as to the results already accomplished by these reservoirs. The appropriation here proposed is a very modest one compared with some which may be found in this bill. This appropriation is absolutely necessary for the completion of some of the works already in process of construction, and which will be utterly useless and go to waste unless they are completed. If the completion of three dams, which is the extent to which the work has gone, as appears by the engineer's report, has accomplished the result which I have stated, it furnishes every encouragement for appropriating at least this meager pittance of $50,000 to finish the reservoirs already under way; and the expenditure already made will be measurably lost unless this work goes on.

The entire appropriation estimated for, about $2,000,000, was intended not only for the State of Minnesota, but also for the State of Wisconsin. If this work is carried on to a completion of the proposed system I apprehend that the stage of water in the river will be largely increased not only so far as Lake Pepin but far below. This appropriation seems to me so manifestly judicious that I think nothing further need be said upon it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is my friend prepared to state how far below Lake Pepin the effect of these reservoirs is felt upon navigation?

Mr. GILFILLAN. The practical observations of the engineers have not been extended below Lake Pepin, but the expectation is that if the appropriations be made and the works constructed in accordance with the plans of the engineers and properly operated, the volume of the stream will be thereby largely increased a long distance below Lake Pepin. That expectation is of course somewhat conjectural, but I have stated the results actually accomplished as verified by the practical observations and tests made by the engineer during the last season.

I hope the motion to amend will not prevail.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids: Continuing improvement, $510,000; of which sum $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the removal of the rock at Duck Creek Chain, at the Rock Island Rapids.

Mr. GILFILLAN. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the clause which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And of which sum the further amount of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used by the Secretary of War in his discretion for continuing the practical test of the flume invented by M. J. Adams, the said test to be made under the supervision and direction of said Adams; but if not so used, the same shall remain as a part of said appropriation and be used for the purposes first in this paragraph specified.

Mr. GILFILLAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, it will be observed, does not, to any extent, increase the appropriation in the bill. It simply adds a new or additional specification of the purposes for which the moneys appropriated, or a small part thereof, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used. I believe the amendment is not objectionable to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and and Harbors, and therefore I will not consume the time of the committee unless some objection be made or some question be asked.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope the gentleman will give us some explanation of the purposes of this expenditure.

Mr. GILFILLAN. It is simply to continue the practical test of a flume invented by M. J. Adams for the improvement of shallow streams. The test has already been commenced by the Government and carried to a partial completion. This amendment simply authorizes the Secretary of War to continue this test, if, in his discretion, he deems it prudent and wise to do so.

Mr. WILLIS. The matter is left entirely to the Secretary of War. I will state that this is a very hard case. The Government, years ago, before the present committee had charge of the river and harbor bill, seems to have committed itself to this improvement. This man, relying upon the faith of the Government, went ahead with the improvement, and, I understand, has been made bankrupt in attempting to carry out the policy of the Government in this matter. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors have not, as a committee, acted upon this subject; but I make this statement in the interest, as I believe, of private justice.

Mr. REAGAN. This flume, the model of which was before us, is intended to be used for deepening and straightening the channels of sandy streams having shifting beds. The purpose is to force water into the flume, and by directing jets of water to continue to disturb the sand. I understand that an appropriation of $20,000 has already been made for material, but that the flume has not been sufficiently tested. It is now desired to utilize the material already on hand for the purpose of testing the value of this flume, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and in his discretion. I believe the plan is worthy of trial; and I trust the House will adopt the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. GILFILLAN was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will be obliged to my friend the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors if he will tell me the distance from Saint Paul to the Des Moines Rapids.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] can answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman from Illinois is not present. Is it 200 or 300 miles—or how far?

Mr. WILLIS. It is four or five, and may be six hundred miles.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The reason I desire that information is this: There is here appropriated $510,000 for improving the Mississippi River for this number of miles, which is a larger sum than is appropriated for the Missouri River. The question I wish to make is whether the ultimate improvement contemplated by this bill would have greater effect on the commerce of the Mississippi than the improvement of the Missouri would have on the Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. I give it up. I am not prepared to answer that question as fully as the gentleman desires. I will state the committee accepts the estimates of the engineers. The engineers make for each of these rivers an estimate, and we take the estimates for all the great rivers—the Mississippi and the Missouri—and give to them, recognizing their equal importance, about the same percentage.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It seems to me the Mississippi River has received very large appropriations—much larger in my judgment than it should have received in fairness. As I said the other day, I think this three and three-quarter millions of dollars for the Mississippi is not a fair divide. That is all I wish to say.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Read!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River at Des Moines Rapids Canal, under the modified project, $35,000; of which sum $20,000 are to be used for pier construction.

Mr. WILLIS. I am instructed by the committee to move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

In extending the outer wall of the canal to the pivot-pier of the bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For dry-dock at Des Moines Rapids, $65,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving ice-harbor at Dubuque, Iowa: The unexpended balance, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to paving instead of riprapping the said ice-harbor.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, including the River at Quincy Bay and the removal of the bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek; including also the strengthening of Sny Island levee where it crosses Snicarte Slough and other sloughs referred to in the report of Engineer Maj. A. Mackenzie, dated the 26th of January, 1885, which work of strengthening said levee shall be performed according to the suggestions and estimates of said Mackenzie, as set forth in said report: Continuing improvement, $200,000: Provided, That not more than $16,500 shall be expended at Sny Island levee.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the commendable silence of my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I am very glad to see that he makes no objection to the appropriation of $35,000 for the Des Moines Rapids Canal in Iowa, or the $65,000 for the Des Moines Rapids dry-dock, or to any part of the $510,000 for improving the Mississppi River from Saint Paul to the Des Moines Rapids and the improvement at Rock Island Rapids, or to any part of the $200,000 for improving the Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, aggregating the sum of $810,000, which expenditures must be largely for the benefit of Iowa. The gentleman makes no criticism here, nor does he tell the House that these are unnecessarily large expenditures. And he is right; and I commend him for not objecting, for these expenditures are essential to the commerce of our country, and being essential, the locality of the improvement should not affect any gentleman's vote.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to observe that no gentleman has attempted to reduce these appropriations, which are so largely for the benefit of the State of Iowa. They are important and they are necessary; but not more necessary than other appropriations which have been alluded to and sometimes criticised by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to offer an amendment as soon as I can get the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. I alluded yesterday to the former appropriations which were expended upon the Des Moines Rapids Canal, amounting in all to between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, and I referred to them as a proper and judicious expenditure of public money; but I have been sorry to notice that the gentleman from Iowa has on two separate occasions during this discussion referred in what I regarded as an unfriendly spirit to the appropriations for improvements in Alabama. If he has examined the items of these appropriations he will certainly admit that they are national in their character—at least four-fifths of the amount are for works which are eminently national and by no means local. Vessels from New England, New York, and Pennsylvania are constantly sailing and steaming into the harbor of Mobile, and it is certainly important to the citizens of those States that the harbor should be so improved that the vessels owned by them should be able to enter and leave that port in safety.

The improvement of the Tennessee River is certainly a work of national importance, and should not be characterized as a work for the benefit of Alabama. The States directly benefited by the appropriation which will open the navigation of the Tennessee River will be all the Northwest, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Illinois and Missouri, because it will open a vast market for their grains and other products. For the same reason it will be a benefit to Ohio and Indiana. It will benefit Pennsylvania, because the cheap ores which they need and now get by costly railroad transportation can then be carried to them at one-half or probably one-fourth the expense. It will benefit South Carolina and Georgia, because they can then get grains and meats from the Northwest at less than one-half the rates of freight which they now have to pay. It will benefit the whole world, because it will open by water way to the whole world the minerals, the farm products, the timbers, and the marbles which are found on the banks of the Tennessee River.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, I desire to notice the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa relative to the appropriations for the States which are represented on the committee. He enumerates a list of appropriations which aggregate $4,394,100, and I presume he has made the best case possible for his proposition, and has cited the bulk of the appropriations for those States which have representatives on the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are fifteen States represented on that committee—nearly one-half of the States of the Union—and the appropriations he has specified amount to but little more than one-fourth of the total sum appropriated by the bill. It seems to me the members of the committee have been very liberal to other States and not at all so toward their own. And this is more noticeable when we consider the fact that the area of the fifteen States that are represented on the committee is equal to the area of the twenty-three States not so represented; and it becomes more remarkable still when we consider the additional fact that the States represented on the committee possess nearly all the important water ways and by far the most important harbors in the United States.

I am surprised at the magnitude of the error into which the gentleman has fallen in making this attack upon the committee. I think the committee are entitled to the highest commendation for their laborious attention to detail in preparing the bill, for their studied impartiality, and for the marked courtesy they have extended to every member of this House. I think they have merited the thanks of this House and not the censure of any member, it matters not how mild and bland he may be in administering it. The appointment of such a committee is simply an additional evidence of the wisdom and sagacity which presides over the deliberations of this House.

In closing let me say to those gentlemen who oppose this bill that they should bear in mind that no money expended by the Government is managed with more skill, economy, and integrity than the appropriations for our rivers and harbors, disbursed under the direction and supervision of the officers of the Corps of Engineers. And certainly all will admit that the expenditure for rivers and harbors inures more directly to the benefit of the great body of the people than any other outlay of money by the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, and every effort of mine in this Congress shall have for its object to increase the prosperity and grandeur of the country by adding to the happiness and welfare of the people.

Mr. ROWELL. I move to strike out from line 1092 to 1101 the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Including also the strengthening of Sny Island levee where it crosses Snicarte Slough and other sloughs referred to in the report of Engineer Maj. A. Mackenzie, dated the 26th of January, 1885, which work of strengthening said levee shall be performed according to the suggestions and estimates of said Mackenzie, as set forth in said report: Continuing improvement, $200,000: Provided, That not more than $16,500 shall be expended at Sny Island levee.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, this is a provision to donate $16,500 to some citizens of Illinois, and if I could consistently I would not object. But not believing it is the duty of the Government to donate money to anybody, I am obliged to object to this appropriation. Sny Island is a body of some hundred acres of land, and it becomes an island by reason of the Sny Island levee. Under the drainage and levee laws this land on the island has been improved and protected by levees, the cost of which is charged so far as benefited upon the lands included in that island. For every one dollar spent in that improvement the lands have been enhanced in value at least $5. The appropriation here is to help repair the levee of Sny Island where it crosses Snicarte Slough and three other sloughs. And the only basis of it in any recommendation is found in the engineer's report, which I will read:

(1) The Sny levee has not, as a levee, benefited navigation, but there are portions of the embankment which may be accepted as closing-dams when made secure, and as such will, theoretically at least, benefit navigation.

Now, a man by the name of Clark, living in Hannibal, Mo., and presumaby one of the owners of the land over in the Snicarte, wrote to the authorities and insisted upon having a survey made to test the question as to how much benefit this Sny Island levee had done to the navigation of the river. The engineer makes his report, declaring that no practical benefit has resulted to the navigation of the river, while theoretically there is a benefit. He says that from 3 to 5 per cent. of the waters escape over these sloughs in low water, and that there is no perceptible injury to the low-water navigation when the levees are not in existence, but theoretically, by closing up and stopping the escaping waters, the 1 per cent. that goes through this slough, there may be some benefit, not practical, however, for he reports against it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What do you mean by "theoretical" benefit?

Mr. ROWELL. That is the term used by the engineer in his report. Mr. Chairman, you may read the two reports of the engineer, and you will find that he makes no recommendation for this appropriation of money.

There is an absolute statement of facts all through the report that it will do no good; but finally, to satisfy this man Clark and other landowners there, he is compelled to give some force to their wishes, and consents that theoretically there may be a benefit to navigation. Illinois has already had trouble upon the question of these levees and the lands embraced in this improvement.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me interrupt the gentleman a moment. I suppose the engineer means that there is a theoretical benefit to the Government and a practical benefit to the land-owners there?

Mr. ROWELL. The engineer is induced to make a report upon the work, and he does all he can to prevent saying that it is done in the interest of the men who have made fortunes out of these Sny lands. Here are 100,000 acres of this land, swamp lands, worth scarcely anything before these improvements, and they are the richest in the world when the water is kept from them; when assessments are made upon them for their drainage and improvement by levees——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, obtained the floor, and by consent yielded the time to Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. ROWELL. A levee and drainage district under the law is organized, and the cost of the improvement is assessed upon the land. That is collected under the laws of the State, and this levee has been built all around these lands on this island, but it takes some money every year to keep it up.

This land is now worth, I do not know how much, probably $50 or $60 an acre, when it was not worth a dollar previous to these improvements, and it cost about $4 an acre to levee and improve it.

We are now asked to divert over $16,000 for the improvement of that river in the interest of these lands again, and I object to it. If we are going to give it anywhere I should be glad that the State of Illinois shall have it, but I object to the principle.

I have taken this position because this is a subject of which I have personal knowledge, and it is little things just like this which make members distrust the wisdom of the committee in preparing such a bill. It is just such things as this continually appearing in bills of this character which delay their passage through the House, and which force members to distrust such appropriation bills altogether; and I hope by calling attention to this to secure the striking out of these words until we have really some occasion to put on little things like these, diverting the public money from great public improvements into the hands of individuals.

Mr. RIGGS. I do not suppose my colleague desires to mislead anybody, but yet in the brief time he has occupied the floor he did not have an opportunity to call the attention of this committee to the fact that this same engineer has officially said that benefit has resulted to navigation from the construction of this levee.

Mr. ROWELL. Will my colleague tell me where?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROWELL. I would be glad to see it.

Mr. RIGGS. I will read it for you. In a letter written by this same engineer, addressed to the Chief of Engineers, on the 9th of September, 1884——

Mr. ROWELL. What page?

Mr. RIGGS. Page 1711.

Mr. ROWELL. I have it here.

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir. He uses this language:

Some benefit has resulted from the construction of a levee——

Mr. ROWELL. Whereabouts is that?

Mr. RIGGS. Page 1711.

Some benefit has resulted from the construction of the levee; the value of such benefit being the cost of such work as the Government would have undertaken for closing these side sloughs.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it not true that on a subsequent investigation he reported that no benefit had resulted?

Mr. RIGGS. No, sir, that is not true; but it is true that the plan for the improvement of that reach of the river from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois involves, under the engineer's plan adopted, the close of these side sloughs and confining the water within the banks of the river. That is so stated by the same engineer and forms a part of the plan.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion? My friend from Illinois a little below the point where he was reading would have found that the engineer says this:

These amounts—

The identical amounts appropriated in this bill—

are such as would have been required to close the four sloughs referred to in accordance with the Government methods.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes; if the State had not done it.

Mr. RIGGS. If I may be permitted, I will repeat the statement that the plans adopted by the engineers and stated in their reports involved the closing of these side sloughs. This same engineer says the Government would have closed these four sloughs, but private individuals, having, at an expense of $600,000, constructed this levee and closed these sloughs, asked that the Government should not repair the levee; repair is not the best word—but should protect the levee at points where the Government would have closed those side sloughs.

Mr. ROWELL. I call attention to this sentence in the engineer's report:

To confine the water which would otherwise, for a very brief period, escape over the banks during high stages might possibly have a slight effect on the movement of the sand, but such additional movement would be injurious rather than beneficial.

Mr. RIGGS. I am willing to concede, if my colleague be permitted to select detached sentences, he may make a plausible case; but if he will read all the letters, reports, and estimates which this engineer has written and made with regard to this work he will find it is one which does benefit navigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. Very briefly, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] who first spoke, I wish to say the committee was governed by two considerations. First, because the engineer reported as follows:

Mr. ROWELL. Whereabout?

Mr. WILLIS. On page 1716 of the last report he says:

The Sny levee has not, as a levee, benefited navigation, but there are portions of the embankment which may be accepted as closing-dams when made secure, and as such will, theoretically at least, benefit navigation.

Mr. ROWELL. That is it—"theoretically at least."

Mr. WILLIS. That is one proposition; but another and more important is this. This identical work would have been done by the Government in the benefit of navigation if it had not been done by this company. The gentlemen read from page 1713 of the report. As his colleague remarked, by selecting sentences here and there he might mislead, though not intentionally; he read two or three sentences which might lead to an inference that would not have been warranted if he had read further. I read this from the report:

While the closing of the Sny Slough and any other side channel by the Sny levee has not played the very important part assigned it by Mr. Clark, it must be admitted that if maintenance of the work were guaranteed by the Government it would be benefited to a certain extent, as the Sny Slough, and perhaps other outlets, would, in accordance with approved plans, be closed in time by brush and stone dams built to a height of 5 or 6 feet above low water.

The probable cost of such work would properly represent the benefit conferred on navigation by the Sny levee, if made secure.

The probable cost, as given on page 1717, is the identical amount the committee has recommended; and in connection with that the engineer further says:

These amounts—

The amounts which the committee has allowed—

These amounts are such as would have been required to close the four sloughs, heretofore referred to, in accordance with the Government methods.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Are those sloughs already closed?

Mr. WILLIS. They are closed and are a part of the plans for the improvement of the river; and the engineer reports that in view of the fact that they are a part of those plans this money should be appropriated, and he also says it benefits navigation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Of what benefit is this levee at high water when there is a surplus of water?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know that it is of benefit at that time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then of what benefit is it at low water when the water does not run through the slough?

Mr. WILLIS. Here is the answer to the gentleman's question. I have just read a portion of it:

To confine the water which would otherwise, for a very brief period, escape over the banks during high stages might possibly have a slight effect on the movement of the sand, but such additional movement would be injurious rather than beneficial. It would simply be increasing the causes which now tend to injure low-water navigation. If the river could be prevented from ever exceeding a medium stage, or the stage at which a general movement of sand takes place, navigation would be very much better than it now is. While the closing of the Sny Slough and any other side channel by the Sny levee has not played the very important part assigned it by Mr. Clark, it must be admitted that if maintenance of the work were guaranteed by the Government it would be benefited to a certain extent, as the Sny Slough, and perhaps other outlets, would, in accordance with approved plans, be closed in time—

By the Government—

by brush and stone dams built to a height of 5 or 6 feet above low water. The probable cost of such work—that is, the closing of this slough—would properly represent the benefit conferred on navigation by the Sny levee, if made secure.

And the cost of all that is given at $16,515.85, the amount the committee has allowed as properly chargeable to the Government.

Mr. CUTCHEON. In other words, as I understand, the money has been already expended, and now the Government proposes to appropriate it because it has been expended.

Mr. WILLIS. Because it was part of the Government's plans.

Mr. ROWELL. I want to read a little more from this report. I read from page 1713:

As regards the general effect of the Sny levee on the Upper Mississippi, excepting when it confines water to the main river during low-water stage, I can not see that it can in any way benefit the low-water channel. The obstructions do not, as on the lower river, consist of sediment carried in suspension, but almost entirely of sand rolled along the bottom. When the river is high and bars all covered, low-water channels are more or less obliterated. As the water falls and the bars appear, low-water channels are again cut out. If the fall is rapid, temporary difficulty is almost sure to result. If the fall is gradual, a low-water channel is apt to be made by the time it is needed. Each high water will produce changes of channel, and often entirely change the troublesome localities.

Now in regard to this Sny Slough——

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman continues his reading six lines further he will find the case stated. He stops just at that point.

Mr. ROWELL. On the same page I find this:

Supposing the entrance to the Sny Slough to have been open at all stages, the amount of water carried by it would have been comparatively small, especially at stages when the additional water was desirable in the main river; but I am informed the entrance to the slough was obstructed by a bar to such an extent that at low stages parties interested in a water-power on the slough were obliged to keep communication open with shovels.

And that was before there was anything done to close up this slough. There was a water-power down there that Illinois had a litigation over when they went to work and closed up this levee which the engineer is finally induced to say might represent the value of the money provided its continuance forever were guaranteed. There is nowhere in the report a recommendation that this money shall be expended; there is simply an admission that theoretically it may do some good. But there is a declaration in the opening of the report that the building of this levee and the closing of Snicarte Slough and the other three sloughs has not as yet, though it was completed in 1872, benefited navigation along there in the least. The engineer states that as a fact, and he only concedes, because it is a part of the theory and the plan originally adopted for improving the Mississippi River, that the closing up of these low sloughs so as to avoid the little escape of water which occurs at low-water mark may possibly be justified by the result.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we hear a good deal about building levees in the interest of navigation, and it is because levees have been built apparently in the interest of navigation when many persons believe that they were built to secure land from the abrasion of the water that so many people in this country are disgusted generally with river and harbor bills. I do trust, therefore, that whatever may be done elsewhere on the Mississippi, there will be no appropriation of that kind made for any point within the State of Illinois. The facts of this case seem to have been made clear, not only by what has fallen from my colleague [Mr. ROWELL], but also from the remarks of the chairman of the committee. From the report of the engineer it appears that at a low stage of water there is a bar which almost closes these sloughs. At a high stage of water the only effect of the levee is to secure the land. There is no pretense that at the high stage of water this levee, or any strengthening thereof, will have any perceptible influence on navigation, and what the engineer means when he says that there is a theoretical benefit from it is that a certain amount of water which escapes might, if it were retained in the channel, increase by a very small percentage the scouring effect of the current.

But the main purpose of this levee is to secure the land from inundation, and no appropriation of this kind ought to be made unless its influence upon navigation is so large in proportion to its effect in securing the lands of private land-owners that it may be truly said that its effects in securing the lands is almost insignificant. Now, in this case that is the main effect, there is little or no influence upon navigation; and we in the North, who are somewhat accustomed to criticise appropriations for the Lower Mississippi, because levees there are built ostensibly for navigation but really, as many people believe, for another purpose—we, I say, in the North, and especially in the State of Illinois, ought to be careful how we by our silence permit any such appropriation to go upon this bill for any point within the State of Illinois. For my part I should feel mortified if such an appropriation were to pass here unchallenged.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing in the world personally about Sny Island levee. I do not even know that it is true, as stated by my friend and colleague [Mr. RIGGS], that the people in that neighborhood have themselves expended $600,000 in making that levee. I do know, however, that they have expended a large amount of money there, but I do not understand that they ask the Government to reimburse them one single dollar of the money which they have expended; and the only question for us now to consider is whether the navigation of the river at that point is benefited by the improvement which has been made and which now must be maintained.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinios. Will my colleague permit a single question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Suppose we did not appropriate one dollar, would not the private owners of that land maintain that levee for their own private purposes sufficiently to maintain substantially good navigation?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I do not know whether they would or not; but, without answering that question further, I will say that if the work is in the interest of navigation I do not think they ought to be required to do it. And I want to say, in addition, that whatever the engineer may say in regard to this improvement, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], whom I do not now see in his seat, who lives in the neighborhood and understands the subject, has repeatedly stated that the work there does benefit navigation by confining the water to the river. It has benefited navigation, not only in the low stages of water, but at all times when the water would escape through these sloughs, and the engineer states that a part of the plan for the improvement of the river is to close up these sloughs. That being so, and the engineer having estimated what the cost of improvement would be, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have simply recommended that that amount of money, or a sum not exceeding that amount, may be expended by the engineer for his work.

Now, there is nothing in that which is discreditable to the State of Illinois; there is nothing that is discreditable to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in having included this item in the bill. We have been assured, not only by my colleague, who represents that district [Mr. RIGGS], but, as I have said, by a Representative from the State of Missouri [Mr. HATCH], that there has been a great benefit to the navigation of the river; and if that be so, and the people there have expended $600,000 upon that work, and if it be necessary to maintain some portion of the work, not for the purpose of protecting their property, but in the interest of navigation, I certainly can see no objection to this appropriation. I care nothing personally as to what may be done about it, but I simply say that I believe this is a proper item to be retained in this bill in view of what the engineer says about it, and in view of what Representatives upon both sides of the river have told us as to the influence of this work upon navigation—for certainly they are not interested in protecting the private property.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to criticise this bill. I think that the committee have aimed to make a fair and reasonable bill. As I understand the question now presented, it is about this: Certain parties have built a levee for their private benefit, to reclaim their own lands. They have realized the benefit of this work; and now they propose to recoup from the Government a portion of their expenditure, because, if they had not made this levee the Government, in pursuance of some general plan of improvement, might have made it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. They spent the money.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I know they spent the money; but they got the benefit of the expenditure upon their lands. Now, there is just one question for this committee to consider; that is the question of navigation. Will this proposed expenditure benefit the navigation of that river? If it will, then it ought to be made; if not, it ought not to be made.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is there not another question? If it does benefit navigation, the question is whether that benefit is necessary?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, there are three stages of water to be considered. First, there is the high stage; and the engineer says that at the high stage of water, with the additional amount of sand, this work is an injury rather than a benefit to navigation. Then there is the low stage of water. At the low stage there is no water escaping through this Snicarte Slough, and therefore it can not be any benefit to the navigation. Then there remains the medium stage. There is no complaint that at the medium stage the river is not all right for navigation. So that this work is no benefit at high water, it is no benefit at low water, and it is no benefit at mean water. This is simply a proposition for recoupment by the land-owners upon the Government; and I think the Committee of the Whole would do well to agree to strike out this appropriation of $16,500.

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, as I represent the district in which this Snicarte Slough is situated, I do not wish any false impression made upon the minds of members in regard to the matter. My colleague over the way [Mr. ROWELL], who represents the Bloomington district, asserts that this is a proposition to donate $16,500 to certain gentlemen in my district.

Mr. ROWELL. In your district and that of General HATCH.

Mr. RIGGS. These people do not live in Bloomington; they do not live in Chicago. This is not a proposition to expend money for a canal to drain Chicago nor is it a proposition to donate $16,500 to anybody. The Mississippi River Commission, speaking of this reach of the Mississippi River, has said that—

> The system of improvement now being carried out between Des Moines Rapids and the mouth of the Illinois River, which consists in closing side chutes and reducing the stream to a uniform width, will in time accomplish all the results claimed for it.

The commission says that a part of the plan is to close these side chutes and confine the water within the banks of the river. The engineer whom the Government has placed in charge of the river improvement at this point says that the Government would have closed four of the side chutes which have been closed by this Snicarte levee. These people did this with their money. True, it was done for their own benefit. But the constant tendency of the water is to cut away the base of the levee at the point where it crosses these four side chutes. Now, what is asked here is that the Government protect this levee to the height of 6 feet at this point, where the engineer says the Government not only should protect these levees, but would have built them. These people have built them for the Government and have closed those four side chutes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. They have built this levee not for the Government, but for themselves, and now they want the Government to pay them for it.

Mr. RIGGS. They have built it, and the Government will get the benefit of it, if there is any benefit, and the engineer says there is.

Mr. ROWELL. Does the gentleman think the Government would have built this levee across the upper mouth of the Snicarte Slough and taken upon itself the responsibility of paying mill-owners heavy damages for interfering with the water-power?

Mr. RIGGS. I do not know. But judging from the many things which the Government has done in connection with river improvements, I should say yes. With this bill before me, I would not hesitate to say yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this provision its purpose is not, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] supposes, to repay private individuals for something that has been done. Nobody is asking to be "recouped" from the Government. This is simply a proposition to strengthen an existing levee. This levee was erected by private capital. The Government engineers say that had the levee not been put there the Government would itself have closed these four chutes. This levee, constructed by private capital, is now in process of destruction. To prevent that destruction, to strengthen the levee, this appropriation is proposed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman explain how the strengthening of the levee will benefit navigation?

Mr. WILLIS. Well, I have already gone over that question. The engineers have stated the matter as fully as I could. This work aids navigation by preventing the water being taken out of the main channel—by confining it in one channel.

In order to perfect the text of the bill before the question is taken on the motion to strike out, I move to amend by adding at the end of line 1101 these words:

> Provided, It is in the judgment of the engineers in the interest of navigation and in accordance with the plans of the engineers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why not strike out the last clause, "in accordance with the plans of the engineers?"

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment proposes to require two things: first, that this expenditure shall be in the interest of navigation; second, that it shall be in accordance with the plans of the engineers. It thus meets the objection of my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] and all the objections which have been made to this provision.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If this is in the interest of navigation it might be made; but suppose it is not in the interest of navigation, but simply in the interest of land-owners there, why the appropriation would be expended because it may be in accordance with the plan of the engineers.

Mr. WILLIS. This is not in the disjunctive; it requires both of these things to exist; it must not only be in the interest of navigation, but upon the plan of the engineers.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do you think that is a good way to make appropriations?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I think it is the very best way to guard all appropriations.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. While it may be a proper thing for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to follow the plans of the engineers, I believe this House can rise to a higher plane of action.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, it can go over the hills where there are no rivers. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Here is a place in Illinois, and I am glad it is in a Northern and not in one of the Southern States, where, so far as I have been able to gather information from reports, this improvement is mainly for the benefit of the owners of land adjacent thereto—not only to deepen the channel or improve the navigation, but to benefit the private owners adjacent thereto by the enhancement of the value of their property. Now, sir, I propose to act irrespective of the plan of any engineer. I am frank to say I do not think engineers were constituted by God as of authority transcendent so as to dominate everything. Not by a great deal. The question before the House is whether this appropriation should be made for the benenfit of navigation; and I think it ought not. It is not for the benefit of navigation, and I think this committee should vote to strike it out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. WILLIS was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. ROWELL'S motion to strike out.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 74.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum has voted. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow us to vote on this paragraph in the House by yeas and nays, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I withdraw the point of no quorum, with the understanding a vote shall be had on this paragraph in the House by yeas and nays.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; of which $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in extending the work for the protection of the eastwardly bank of the Mississippi River at Cairo, and the prevention of its wash or erosion, commencing at the southerly end of the present Government revetment work and continuing down stream.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the first amendment of the committee, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In line 1103, after "Ohio River," insert the following:
> "Including the completion of the work at Alton, and, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs next on the amendment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Insert at the end of the paragraph the following:
> "And the River Commission may, in their discretion, use so much of said sum of $500,000 as may be necessary to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis."

Mr. GLOVER. I have an amendment here, Mr. Chairman, looking to the striking out of the words just read by the Clerk.

Mr. WILLIS. The committee will withdraw its amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the amendment of the committee just read by the Clerk is withdrawn, and is not before the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. That removes the necessity for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. CLARDY. I move, in line 1107, to strike out "five" and insert "six," so it will read "continuing improvement, $600,000."

The bill proposes to appropriate $500,000 to improve the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois and the mouth of the Ohio

Rivers; $50,000 of which it provides shall be diverted to an improvement at Cairo, which was pointed to by the engineer in charge of the work in a report submitted in 1884 as an evidence of the inutility of attempting to improve the navigation of the river by a piecemeal process, having reference primarily to the improvement and betterment of private property.

It may be necessary now, in order to preserve some small benefits which may have accrued to commerce by reason of expenditures heretofore made, without the recommendation and against the suggestions of the engineer, to make the allotment proposed by the committee. About that I express no opinion, because I have not time to state the facts which induce it. The bill further contemplates the diversion of whatever may be necessary to complete the improvement at Alton, Ill., and whatever may be needed to protect the banks of the Mississippi River opposite the mouth of the Missouri. I express no opinion as to the necessity for these appropriations at Alton and at the point opposite the mouth of the Missouri River, because I have no knowledge or information sufficient to form one. They may be and doubtless are meritorious works. I believe the proposed appropriation to correct the current and improve the channel at Saint Louis has on motion of my colleague [Mr. GLOVER] been stricken out, and I am glad of it.

But I want to inquire, Mr. Chairman, when the amount allotted for the improvement at Cairo is subtracted from the $500,000, and the amount necessary to the completion of the work at Alton is taken out, and whatever is needed to protect the banks of the Mississippi River opposite the mouth of the Missouri River is also withdrawn, what if any portion of the $500,000 will be left to prosecute the plans for the systematic improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois and Cairo, a distance of 241 miles? There is no reach of the river, Mr. Chairman, from the passes to Des Moines Rapids where the money expended has yielded such munificent returns as the section of the river I am discussing.

Commencing with Horse-tail bar, where a channel width of 5,000 feet has been reduced to a uniform width of 2,500 feet for a distance of 5 miles and where a low-water depth of 4 feet has been increased to 9½ feet, and going on down the river you find not only the evidence that the money of the Government has been expended——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL was recognized, and, by consent, yielded his time to Mr. CLARDY.

Mr. CLARDY. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his courtesy.

Not only, I say, do you find evidence that the money of the Government has been expended—you can find that testimony anywhere on the river, or on any other river in the country—but you find the incontestable proof that there has been a corresponding benefit to the navigation of the river.

Mr. Chairman, for the fiscal year ending June, 1882, $600,000 were appropriated for the improvement of this reach of the river, and in addition to that $35,000 were appropriated for a work at Saint Louis, $20,000 for a work at Cape Girardeau, and, I believe, $25,000 for an improvement at the Minturn Point, Illinois.

These appropriations were made upon a river and harbor bill that carried $11,441,300, and in which only $1,000,000 were appropriated for the river below Cairo; while upon this bill, that carries more than $15,000,000, it is proposed to reduce the sum to $500,000, and to adopt a diffusive process, which renders it doubtful whether $200,000 or $100,000, or any other sum, will be left to prosecute the legitimate work of river improvement.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The "diffusive" process is the process adopted on the river below Cairo, I presume.

Mr. CLARDY. I can not say as to that. The diffusive process of which I speak consists in parceling out the appropriation which has for its basis the recommendation of the engineer in charge of the work to objects not embraced in his plans for improving the navigation of the river and for which there are no estimates.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, $600,000 were again appropriated for this improvement; and at the last session of this Congress, on my motion, an amendment similar to the one I have just offered was adopted with great unanimity by the Committee of the Whole House, increasing this appropriation from $400,000 to $600,000. The Committee on River and Harbors, in their report, offer as an apology for the size of the bill before us the fact that the last Congress passed no river and harbor bill; and they indicate that the increased appropriation for the river south of Cairo is because there are in fact two annual appropriations in one.

There seem to be two bills in one so far as the river below Cairo is concerned, and a half a bill in one so far as the sections above that point are concerned. I desire to remind the committee reporting this bill that the source of the Mississippi River is not at Cairo, but that there is a long reach of the river running up to the Des Moines Rapids, and that the people of that section are interested in the improvement of the whole river, and that their Representatives on this floor intend to insist upon adequate appropriations from the headwaters to the Gulf.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I hope now we will have a vote. This is as large an appropriation in proportion as for any other river in the country.

Mr. GLOVER was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CLARDY.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire to occupy but a moment in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not said much, and I hope that the gentleman will permit us now to proceed without further discussion and get through with this bill.

Mr. CLARDY. This the first time I have said anything during the discussion of this bill I believe, and my apology for consuming the time of the committee now is that the people of my State, together with all the other people of the Mississippi Valley who do not own and operate railroads, are interested in so improving that river that it may become the regulator of interstate commerce.

I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say something about the percentage of the estimates which he gave us. Let me say to him that it was upon an estimate of $1,000,000 that this House at its last session increased this appropriation to $600,000. It was upon that estimate that every appropriation has been made since the plans for the improvement of the river have been adopted.

And let me say further to the gentlemen that the engineer upon this section of the river does not seem to have fallen into the very reprehensible habit of asking for more than is required for fear that he may get less.

Major Ernst, the engineer to whom I refer, is a gentleman of acknowledged ability in his profession, as the plans formulated and the work done by him attest, and his estimate of the aggregate amount required for the completion of the work on this part of the river was made upon the supposition that money would be appropriated in accordance with his annual estimates.

Mr. GLOVER. I rise to heartily indorse the amendment proposed by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY], although I am a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have found in the preparation of the bill a closeness in the estimates of the engineers for that reach of the river between the Illinois and the Ohio which is not to be observed in any other portion of the estimates of the engineers. I have observed with regret that provisions are made for that reach of the river which may divert the bulk of the money intended for the improvement of the channel. I have observed in the scrutiny of this entire question the fact that there—and you might almost say there alone—an abundant return for the money invested by the Federal Government is always given; it is as sure to come back in the improvement of the channels as the seed cast upon good ground is certain to fructify and grow and bear fruit. And I may say that that portion of the river is the portion of the improvement of the Mississippi River which forms the solid basis for the hope that the money of the Government will ultimately, so far as the river is concerned, render the proper returns.

Horsetail bar is always pointed to as a proof that there the engineers' plans adopted have triumphed. And I will say it is the policy of this Congress to bestow liberal appropriations on that reach in order that it may progress and may continue to be the model so far as the improvement of the main trunk of the river is concerned, and that the results may be such that they may be pointed to whenever skeptics undertake to doubt the reality of this improvement. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HATCH. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement to the committee. When the paragraph embraced between line 1092 and line 1098 was under consideration I was temporarily absent from the House. I desire to state to the committee that part of the river embraced in the lines I have indicated lies within from a mile and a half to three miles of the city where I reside. Prior to the building of this Sny levee the worst bar in the river between Saint Louis and Keokuk was just below the mouth of this sny. I have seen it time and again myself when the boats for weeks were unable to pass that point without lighters. I have been upon a boat upon that bar when there were four other steamboats drawing less than 4 feet of water aground upon it.

This levee was built upon the east side of the river, a high bank being upon the left, and in one single season after the building of that levee that bar disappeared without any work on the part of the United States engineers who were in charge of that part of the river, and not a single boat from that day to this has ever touched bottom upon it. It is the best practical demonstration of the theory of Captain Eads for the improvement of the Mississippi River that has been made in the last twenty years.

I would not give the demonstration of that fact which has stood there now for ten years for all the theories of all the engineers in the United States as to the improvement of the river.

Every steamboatman on the Mississippi River knows it. The closing of the mouth of that sny and the building of that levee and the confining the waters to the natural channel of the river have improved the navigation and the channel of the river more than the engineers of the United States would have done with the expenditure of $100,000.

The proposition embraced in this paragraph is not to build a levee. There has been such a hue and cry in this House for the past few years on the part of members who know nothing more about the Mississippi River than they know about the condition of a river in the moon, if there is one, that every time a levee is mentioned it is like shaking a red rag in a bull's face; but the fact is, the best and cheapest way to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River is with levees as a part of the plan.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SWOPE was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HATCH.

Mr. HATCH. I am obliged to the gentleman.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that any plan has ever been or ever will be devised for the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River that omits the building of proper levees and the strengthening of the banks. The levee of which I speak is above 70 miles long, and was built by private enterprise, by a private corporation. It has done more for the improvement of those 70 miles of the Mississippi River than all the work done by the money that has been expended by the War Department during the last fifteen years.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio (sotto voce). Better leave it to private enterprise.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] suggests that we had better leave it to private enterprise. You had better spend your money in the most profitable way, and when you find that private enterprise has developed the proper system for the improvement of the Mississippi River you had better expend your money in that direction. As my friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] has referred to the fact that I have made statements time and again, not only to the House but even the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in regard to the effect of this improvement, I desire to say that the gentleman was correct when he quoted me as having stated the facts of this matter and stated them as facts existing within my personal knowledge.

Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up any time heretofore in the discussion of this bill, and I have just this to say about it now: I have always voted for the river and harbor bill. There are propositions in this bill, as there have been in every other one for which I have voted, that I do not approve; but I will not refuse to vote for a bill for the proper improvement of the navigable rivers and the harbors of the country simply because there are propositions contained in it that do not meet my personal approval.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, during the somewhat extended discussion yesterday the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] saw fit to point out the fact that the river and harbor bill carried upon its face evidence of what he was pleased to term selfishness, and he singled out certain States of the Union which are represented upon the River and Harbor Committee as having been more than mindful of their own just rights in the distribution of these appropriations. I desire to reply in a very few words to the position of the gentleman; admitting, however, that the question how much money goes to any single State, or to any river, or to any harbor has nothing to do with the justice or injustice of a measure like this. There are questions which rise higher than "selfishness," and which ought to settle the judgment of a committee upon questions such as these. But I want to pursue the natural and logical result of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Iowa. The money, or the principal part of the money, which we expend in this country, and which comes from the contributions of the people, is derived from two sources: First, collections from the customs department, and I shall assume for the purpose of what I am going to say that every State in this country in proportion to its population pays exactly the same, so I dismiss that question from further consideration. That leaves me to look for a moment at the disposition which we will make of the $112,000,000 that does not come from individual sources, but does come in such a manner as that we can locate it in the several States of the Union. The fifteen States from which the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors come pay into the Treasury upon this basis of comparison as follows:

Kentucky, $14,842,475; Louisiana, $538,814; Alabama, $73,315; Iowa, $2,222,059; West Virginia, $543,188; Texas, $181,829; Michigan, $1,558,155; Mississippi, $47,951; Missouri, $6,276,165; Illinois, $23,075,864; Pennsylvania, $7,371,209; Massachusetts, $2,287,453; New York, $13,823,644; Ohio, $12,565,516; California, $2,630,160; making a total of $88,019,997 out of the $112,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir. I will do better by you than you did by me.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not the rule of consumption apply to those $112,000,000 of internal revenue the same as to the customs revenue?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not stop now to discuss that question. The total internal-revenue collections for the year ending June 30, 1885, was $112,000,000. Of that amount these States paid more than $88,000,000, and the remaining twenty-three States and the Territories $24,000,000

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OWEN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The nine States singled out by the gentleman from Iowa paid into the Treasury as follows: Texas, $181,829; Louisiana, $538,864; Ohio, $12,565,516; Illinois, $23,075,864; Michigan, $1,558,155; California, $2,613,160; West Virginia, $543,188; Kentucky, $14,842,475; Alabama, $73,315.

The aggregate is $55,992,366, and these States receive by the appropriations in this bill $4,394,000. Thus it will be seen that of their contributions to this aggregate these nine States take out of the Treasury only $4,394,000, and leave in $51,598,366. That is, they put in $51,598,512 more than they take out.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, who as I understand is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, if he believes that the money to be appropriated by this bill should be apportioned among the States according to the amount of revenue that they severally pay to the Government, so that each one shall get its share of the grab, if I may be allowed to use that expression, or does he believe that it should be appropriated where it is needed to benefit commerce?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for me that the gentleman from Maine did not hear what I said in the beginning of my remarks. I said that the respective contributions of the States had nothing to do with the real question, but that it was an answer to the argument that had been made here. If I were to answer the gentleman from Maine further, I would say that his State pays in $53,000 and gets out $86,000—more than she pays in.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And I desire to say, that so far as my district is concerned it does not get out a cent, and that so far as my State is concerned the gentlemen who represent it upon this floor, or at any rate one of them, will vote for appropriations for rivers and harbors wherever they may be needed, without regard to what any one pays into the Treasury or gets out of the Treasury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is exactly the position I have taken, and the gentleman merely repeats it in possibly a little better language. He has broken into my speech and repeated the sentiments of the whole of the first paragraph. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, estimating upon the basis of the $112,000,000 and the contribution of Ohio to that fund, she ought to receive $1,600,000 under this bill; but in fact she puts in some $12,565,516 and takes out $403,000. Thus it will be seen that she puts in $12,162,516 more than she takes out.

Mr. Chairman, I have said this much to show that when the gentleman from Iowa attempts to draw a line based upon the idea of a distribution by States and Territories this sort of logic works itself out. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, as an accompaniment to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] in regard to his personal knowledge covering the effect of a certain class of improvements, I think the House ought to have before it the record knowledge of the Government. I therefore read a single passage from the report of the engineers, page 1715, speaking of this same reach:

> The records show that since the levee was constructed, at points within its influence, most serious obstructions to navigation have either grown up or continued to exist until improved or removed by the work of the Government. Notable among such points are Gilbert's Island, vicinity of Louisiana Bridge, and Slim Island. Obstructions at these points have been as serious as any known to the memory of navigators. The formation of these obstructions is in no way charged to the Sny levee, but that the levee did not prevent their formation, or remove them, is a fact.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have visited all the points involved in river improvements between Saint Louis and Foster's Island; and at no place upon the river has engineering given grander results than in the locality now under consideration. I want to impress upon members the fact that this increased appropriation is asked in good faith. The proposition of my colleague [Mr. CLARDY] to increase this appropriation from $500,000 to $600,000 is made in view of the absolute necessity of securing a larger appropriation there.

A great portion of the flotilla which was engaged in that work having been destroyed during the last winter, a large outlay will be required to replace it. The most serious obstructions to river navigation exist between Saint Louis and Cairo, and until you have removed all obstructions you can not get the benefit of the improvement of the river above that place, as a barge can only be loaded to the depth of water over the shallowest place in the river. This amendment is asked in good faith. This is the most important feature of river improvement on the Mississippi, and I earnestly hope the House will adopt the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CLARDY, there were—ayes 28, noes 46.

Mr. CLARDY. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CLARDY and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "which," in line 1107, the words "thirty thousand dollars, to be expended in improving the river at Cape Girardeau and."

Mr. Chairman, in view of the lateness of the hour and the anxiety of the committee to secure early action on this bill, I will not trespass upon the time of the House with an elaborate discussion of this amendment. I will content myself and doubtless gratify the committee by simply adverting in the briefest way to a subject which is worthy of far more consideration than the limits of debate here will permit.

The project of establishing works of improvement at the point in the Mississippi River to which this amendment refers was inaugurated in 1881 for the purpose of removing the large and annually increasing bar in front of Cape Girardeau, which imperiled its harbor and fatally impaired the navigation of the stream. At that time this, if not the worst, was at least one of the shoalest, most thoroughly obstructed and troublesome portions of the reach between the cities of Cairo and Saint Louis.

According to the report of Major Ernst, the distinguished engineer then in charge, the bar was dry at a stage 16 feet above low-water mark, and the channel liable to a reduction in depth to only 4 feet, and at one time only 2½ feet; a degree of shallowness which not only threatened the extinction of the harbor, but the serious impairment of navigation and the destruction of commerce. The expenditure of $65,000, the very insignificant sum which was allotted to and expended upon the works at this point, satisfactorily removed this immense bar, and gave us a channel 8 feet deep as high up as Minturn Point—all that the commerce of the country demanded or the engineers in charge ever sought to attain; and I dare say that in the history of river improvement no grander achievement was ever made at such trifling cost.

But these works were hastily constructed, for want of adequate appropriations never completed, and, without some means of preservation, as the engineers distinctly state, necessarily temporary in their character. To perpetuate the results of this wise expenditure of the public money and give stability and permanency and value to the works thus established others of a more durable nature were needed and further appropriations were required.

To complete and preserve, therefore, these improvements, estimates of cost were repeatedly submitted, and recommendations of appropriations by the engineers again and again made. For the purpose of preservation a hurdle was erected opposite the city of Cape Girardeau. The ensuing season it was seriously damaged by ice. This fact was embodied in the next report of the engineers, and an appropriation of $42,000 in round numbers was recommended to complete this work and place it beyond the erosive and destructive influences of the river; but by reason of the unwise economy of the Forty-eighth Congress in neglecting to provide for this point during its first session, and in defeating the river and harbor bill, which did provide for it, in the second session, the work of restoration and preservation was delayed, and that already begun was partially if not wholly destroyed.

Like conditions produce like results. The destruction of the hurdle opposite Cape Girardeau, which was designed to protect and perpetuate the good results which had been attained, means the destruction of the efficacy of the entire work, and the return of the bar with all its attendant dangers to the harbor, to navigation, and to commerce. This process of ruinous change is going rapidly on, and I have been recently and credibly informed that the troubles which existed before the first pile was driven or the first willow-web was woven there face those people now.

To stay this destruction and avert a condition of things as deplorable as that which existed before these works of improvement had their inception, a liberal appropriation becomes imperative and should now be made. When once we have rescued a harbor of the commercial importance of Cape Girardeau; when we have removed an immense bar that infested the river and obstructed its navigation and imperiled its commerce; when we have stricken down at least one of the barriers which clog the enterprises of our country and repress, as it were, the energies of our people, no hesitation should be felt, no halt should be called, no backward step should be taken.

Such beneficent results should never be abandoned. Ample provision should be made at once—the restoration and perfection and preservation of these improvements should be assured, and the works at this point placed upon a permanent and enduring basis, beyond the power of the river either to destroy or impair them. Major Ernst recommended that this be done, and asked that $42,000 be set apart for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June, 1886.

Pursuant to that estimate and in compliance with that request the last House appropriated $35,000 for the river at Cape Girardeau. The failure of the river and harbor bill then only emphasizes the reason for granting us $30,000 now. The memory of past evils should admonish us of the dangers of further delay; and the loss which has been sustained by the errors and omissions, the parsimony and neglect of 1884 and 1885 should impress us with the necessity and the justice of according to this part of the reach wiser and more generous treatment during the years 1886 and 1887.

I therefore ask my amiable, eloquent, and obliging friend from Kentucky to accept the amendment I have had the honor to offer, and appeal to the House with no less earnestness than good faith for its adoption.

Mr. WILLIS. This matter has not been considered by our committee, and I have no authority to accept the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. The amendment makes no increase in the aggregate amount of this appropriation, but proposes merely that a certain portion of the sum appropriated be devoted to continuing the improvement at Cape Girardeau, and this has been uniformily recommended by the engineers from the very inception of this enterprise in 1881 to the year ending in June, 1886.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no question whatever that the gentleman's statement is correct, and I assume the engineers would make the same recommendation again. If we make this appropriation in the terms proposed in the bill the expenditure of a portion of the money at the point named by the gentleman will be within the discretion of the engineers. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will not press his amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I repeat that this amendment makes no increase in the amount appropriated, but simply directs that a part of the appropriation made in the bill for the reach between Cairo and Saint Louis be expended at Cape Girardeau, and I insist upon a specific application of the sum asked, because, despite former appropriations, despite former recommendations, and, I might add, despite former neglects and the evils which followed, the commission in whose hands this reach seems lately to have been unwisely placed have wholly ignored this point in their estimate for the year ending in June, 1887.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How high has the levee there been built now?

Mr. DAWSON. There is no levee, and there is no need for one. The city is on an eminence overlooking the river, and its site is as high, dry, beautiful, and picturesque as any among our Western hills.

I am not here asking alms for a local purpose. The appropriation is not designed to protect any city, nor to inure to any private benefit, but is intended wholly and solely for the improvement of the river, and the local benefits we expect are merely incident to the public good.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If that is the fact I do not understand why the Mississippi River Commission recommended it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWSON. The gentleman misunderstood me. The engineers, in whose charge this work formerly was, made the recommendation. The commission, in whose hands it now is, have for the next year ignored it. If I desired to be facetious I might say that the fact that this improvement is a public necessity accounts for the action of the commission.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not understand the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILLIS] to make any objection to this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I did not make myself understood. The committee did not think it wise to make this appropriation. That is the whole of it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DAWSON, it was rejected; there being—ayes 25, noes 62.

Mr. NEECE. I move at the end of line 1101 to add the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $15,000 shall be used in strengthening the levees on the east side of the Mississippi River between Warsaw and Quincy, Ill.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that we have passed that part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the amendment can not be received.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflows: Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel. Of the amount herein appropriated for the Lower Mississippi, $100,000 are to be expended in continuing the work in progress at New Orleans; $250,000 for the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers by preventing further enlargement of the latter stream and restricting its outlet capacity, and for keeping open a navigable channel through the mouth of Red or Old River into the Mississippi; $50,000 in improving navigation in the Greenville Reach by preventing the bank at Greenville from further caving; and $100,000 in deepening the channel at Vicksburg by dredging through the bar existing there; but this last named sum shall not be expended, unless after another examination or survey the commission shall deem it advisable; and if they shall not, then $50,000 shall be expended in the improvement of navigation at Vicksburg by constructing suitable dikes and other appropriate works; and $75,000 in the work on the river at Memphis.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first recurs on the amendment reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the first amendment of the committee, as follows:

Strike out "continuing" and insert "completing;" so it will read:
"Seventy-five thousand dollars in completing the work on the river at Memphis."

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment of the committee was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Add the following:
"Also, $25,000 for work on the river at Hickman, and $25,000 for work on the river at Columbus, Ky."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose that amendment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I do not believe this policy of improving the river at these little towns ought to be continued.

In the bill last year we had a number of provisions for the improvement of harbors at various places. I see the committee have abandoned the use of that word now and propose simply to regard these improvements as part of the general river improvement.

Now, I know of no reason why the wharf of the town of Hickman and the wharf of the town of Columbus should be improved by the General Government, or why the harbor (so called) of Natchez, or the harbor of Memphis, or the harbor of New Orleans, or the harbor of Vicksburg should be improved. These different towns on the banks of the river have submitted themselves to the consideration of Congress in connection with appropriations. Here is a bill granting $2,600,000 and over for the city of New Orleans and $700,000 for the city of Natchez. It seems to me this is a prodigal waste of the public money.

I wish to call the attention of the committee for a moment to the proposed amendment at the city of New Orleans. I have said heretofore it was for the purpose of protecting the levees which protect that city. The gentleman from Louisiana has heretofore contradicted that statement. Now I read from the report of the engineer in charge of the work, which will be found on page 2849 of the report of the Secretary of War. This engineer officer says:

In order to make the city of New Orleans secure from danger of breaks in the levee, and from being gradually washed away, it is necessary to protect the bank in this bend, but the immediate importance of the work is not so great as it is in other portions of the harbor.

Here he is discussing the improvement of Carrollton Bend.

Let me read further:

Approximate estimate for completing work of improving harbor at New Orleans.

Carrollton Bend, left bank	$158,600
Gouldsborough portion of bend, right bank, 5,000 feet long	64,200
Gretna portion of bend, right bank, about 8,600 feet long	64,200
Bend above Gretna to a point nearly opposite the City Park, right bank, 26,400 feet	396,600
Total	683,600

This $683,600 it is necessary the Government should expend in order to prevent the city of New Orleans from being gradually washed away.

This officer further says, in speaking of the improvement at Carrollton Bend:

There are no wharves, and the improvement would be of little benefit to commerce and navigation at present.

Again it is said on page 2974 of the same report——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. REED, of Maine. All right, we will get it all in before we get through.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought I had the page of another portion of the report of this engineer, but I find I have mislaid it. This same engineer in another portion of the report says in reference to another portion of one of these bends, which it is necessary now to improve or will be, is used by a railroad company, and there is a large portion of property on it—$1,400,000.

Mr. WILLIS. It is on page 2849.

Mr. HEPBURN. He says there is $1,400,000 on this bend which will be destroyed if not properly improved by this river improvement.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Unless the navigation is improved.

Mr. HEPBURN. Unless the navigation is improved. I accept the modification. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is no part of the duty of the Government to look after improvements of this kind, which belong alone to the city of New Orleans.

Remember, Mr. Chairman, in this so-called harbor of New Orleans there is now a depth of 100 feet of water and more. And the engineer complains that one of the great difficulties in making the improvement is this wonderful depth of water. It requires them to build up their spur-dikes a hundred feet high in order to get them to the surface of the water; and where they propose to use revetments made of mattresses, the mattress suspended over the bank will have to go down a hundred feet in the river before reaching the bottom, making it exceedingly expensive and difficult first to plant the mattresses and then to keep them there because of the extraordinary seepage. I have no objection to the improvement at that point, but I want the people of New Orleans to make it themselves.

We go a little farther up to the city of Natchez. What in the name of common sense is there in the way of demand growing out of commercial interests that imposes upon the Government of the United States the duty of expending $700,000 in order to protect the commerce of that flea-bitten city?

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that there is no appropriation in this bill for that purpose.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; but there is a recommendation for it. It is among the estimates of the engineers, and while we do not find it to-day in the bill, I suspect you will find it in the next one that comes in.

There is the same kind of a recommendation for Natchez that there is for Hickman and that we find for Columbus. Why do the committee indulge in these preferences for these smaller towns and ignore the larger ones? Now, in the last bill we find that we have appropriated more than a quarter of a million dollars to the city of Memphis. For the purpose of improving the navigation of the river at that point? Not much, sir. No man has claimed that. No one has ever asserted in this House, within my hearing, that the expenditure of that money would do one iota toward a more perfect navigation of the river.

But the river had made a bend and turned towards the Tennessee shore, striking at the mouth of Wolf Creek, which is above the city, and was rapidly cutting away the shore and endangering, as we were then told, and as the engineers tell us, large amounts of the property of individuals, not of the Government; and for the purpose of making that secure, and to prevent the washing into the river of valuable lots, and possibly of buildings, Congress was asked to make that appropriation. But it was not for the purpose of improving the navigation.

And now again it is asked that we vote nearly $100,000 more to complete it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is a little singular to me that two places which are recommended for appropriations by the engineers who have surveyed the rivers shall be singled out to be stricken from this bill by gentlemen who hope to make a reputation before the country by posing as economists, when these two places lie in a section of the country that contributes as much or more to commerce, according to territorial extent, than any other section of the country immediately proposed to be benefited by this river and harbor bill. These places lie in a district more peculiarly situated than any other in America; in a district having more than a thousand miles of river coast; in a district that produces more tobacco than any other district in America. Or, perhaps it would be better to say that while tobacco is one of its chief productions, it is sometimes credited with producing the finest whisky, the best horses, and the most beautiful women in the country. But, be that as it may, I want it distinctly understood that it is a section of the country that is renowned for its water ways. These two places at which the gentlemen now strike lie within that section, and we have come here asking for very little.

We have asked $100,000 for each of these places—Hickman and Columbus—but the committee in their wisdom have seen fit to recommend $25,000; and we are willing to take that, as it seems to be in the same proportion that has been allowed other places.

What is the importance of either one, or both taken together? Mr. Chairman, they are places of large manufacturing and commercial interests; places in which a large and important system of railroads terminate, Columbus having a system coming in from the west of the river and one also from the east, and there is a continual transfer kept up. Hickman is a large manufacturing town, and is the terminus of the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad. Then these places are not the little insignificant towns they are supposed to be by the gentleman who is opposing this appropriation, but they are towns of commercial importance to the country. The people there have been doing, and are doing now, all that can be done to maintain the commerce of the country that flows in and out; and it is the business of this Government, if it is helping other places, if it is improving harbors and rivers in other parts of the country—I say it is its duty to help to take care of the great commercial interests of the people centering there.

But, sir, I apprehend from the motion that is made to strike out these places that the Congress of the United States proposes to keep up the line of policy that has been followed in the past, and that is, that the streams, marshes, and creeks, and little branches shall swallow up the hard earnings of the labor of the country, while those great streams upon which the commerce of the country can float are to be left to neglect. While the points on those rivers that are admitted to maintain a constant commercial relation with the outside world must be allowed to go down because they are not able to withstand the swift current of the Mississippi, insignificant harbors and unnavigable rivers are to be improved at a vast expenditure of the public money.

Why, sir, take the city of Columbus. Twenty years ago I stood there a beardless boy upon those banks. I saw then a good wharf, a street composed of rows of business houses, and other streets that have all gone into the Mississippi River since that day, being washed in by the current that sets against that town. And we come here and ask for a modest sum that will help these people in their efforts there to protect themselves from being washed away, their property carried into the river, and commerce destroyed in that section. Yet it is opposed by gentlemen on this floor whose sections, I apprehend, heretofore have been covered up almost by these appropriations to make harbors and improve small streams.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDEN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. STONE, of Kentucky.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I desire to say only another word or two. These gentlemen ask that the people of that section of country where this improvement is needed shall be deprived of these appropriations and these privileges.

Mr. Chairman, I admit we have not got the coal fields there which are to be benefited so extensively by locking and damming some stream that will not float an ordinary saw-log three months in the year. We have not got the coal fields there, owned by a few individuals, to be benefited by these appropriations. But, Mr. Chairman, we have got an agricultural people; we have got the people there out of whose pockets the money does come that pays these appropriations. We have got the people there that work from early morn until dewy eve to maintain themselves and pay the taxes that are demanded from them to pay these appropriations. It has occurred to me, sir, in the discussion of this bill that it is the people who are working in mines, the people whose mining interests are to be protected, the people whose forests are to be maintained and protected and means made for them to get out their timber—that that class of people are the people who are alone to receive the benefits from the river and harbor bill. The people who dig the earth, who live by toil, are the people who bear the burdens, and when they seek the protection or benefits to be derived from these appropriations gentlemen are ready to get up on this floor and move that they shall not have the benefit of them.

Why, sir, as I have said, we have got more than 1,000 miles of river front. We have got twelve counties in our district, every one of which is washed on its border or through its center by a navigable stream except one. We have got a district that needs more in the way of appropriations for keeping open navigation through it than any other district in the State if you get to the real need, because we are at the mouth of the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and other rivers, making in all seven rivers in and around our district. Yet for all those rivers and for all these purposes we have put into this river and harbor bill the insignificant sum of $100,000; $50,000 given to Grand Chain, and $25,000 each at Columbus and Hickman.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that this House, that seemed so ready to assist these small branches, to assist the marshes, to buy locks and dams, to take State improvements and put them in the possession of the General Government, will refuse our people this pittance. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will not be adopted.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How will this improve the town of Hickman?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. We do not care about this improving the town of Hickman. We want to protect the bank, so that the commerce over that railroad and on the river can be protected and cared for.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. The small appropriation in this bill of $100,000 for the continuation of the Government work at the harbor of New Orleans has attracted the attention and I fear the ire of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. Long before the gentleman from Iowa and myself had been honored with seats on this floor Congress had determined that the Mississippi River at the locality of the city of New Orleans was a harbor, and had made repeated appropriations for it as such; and now to-day my friend from Iowa challenges the statement that there is any harbor at the city of New Orleans needing improvement or protection.

Mr. Chairman, there is a harbor at New Orleans, the gentleman from Iowa to the contrary notwithstanding, which accommodates a greater amount of shipping than any other harbor in the United States except that of the great city of New York. I have the figures here before me to show that in the value of exports and imports the city of New Orleans ranks all the cities of the country except New York. There comes in at the mouth of the Mississippi River and anchors at the harbor of New Orleans a greater tonnage of shipping than enters even the great harbor and port of Boston. Now, sir, while it is true that there is a sufficiency of depth of water in that harbor, it is equally true on the other hand that the harbor of New Orleans needs protection.

I submit in all candor that it is just as legitimate, just as proper, to protect a harbor as regards its commercial facilities as to improve one by dredging to secure greater depth. Now what are the conditions at the city of New Orleans? The river there is three-quarters of a mile wide, and on both sides of it there are wharves extending a distance of four or five miles, making a total of from nine to ten miles of wharfage. That portion of the city away up at Carrollton Bend, concerning which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] read from the report, is not a part of the harbor of New Orleans which the Mississippi River Commission are engaged in improving. He read from the report made in 1884 concerning the Carrollton Bend, and argued from that that this appropriation for the harbor of New Orleans is nothing but an attempt to "riprap" a levee, as he put it, in order to keep it from caving into the river.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. BLANCHARD.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am much obliged to the gentleman. The work which the commission are engaged in at New Orleans Harbor and which they have half completed is at the Goldsborough portion of the harbor, below Carrollton, on the right descending bank of the river at the city of New Orleans. And what is it? Is it the riprapping of a levee, as the gentleman says? Why, sir, the commission in their report state that the work they are engaged in there consists of a system of submerged spurs built out at right angles to the bank, from 500 to 1,600 feet apart. Every dollar of this money is to be expended in work which is sunk down into the water for the protection of a portion of the city's commercial front about two miles in length, where the ocean ships of the world moor in the harbor of New Orleans. The levees which the gentleman speaks of are on the bank, and no part of this appropriation is to be expended upon levees. It is to be expended in protecting the commercial facilities of the harbor from destruction by the currents and forces of the river, and not to prevent the river overflowing its banks by the erection of levees.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have but a moment and can not yield. I say that no portion of this appropriation is to be expended upon a levee or in riprapping. The work is a system of submerged spurs sunk down into the water, and they are needed there as aids to commerce and navigation, as the commission state in their report. In that report they say the river front at the point where the works are located is extensively used for purposes of commerce; and that the commercial interests to be benefited by the improvement can not be estimated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who says that?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is stated right here in the report.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who says it?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The River Commission's report.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Why, they can not estimate anything, not even the cost of the work.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not yield to the gentleman from Maine nor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. I beg their pardon, but my time is too limited.

Mr. Chairman, the very title of this bill is "A bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes." It is shown in the report of the commission that one-half of the work proposed to be done at the Goldsborough front at New Orleans has been done; and here is a moderate appropriation of $100,000 to continue and complete that work. This same fight against the harbor of New Orleans was initiated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and carried on in the Forty-eighth Congress. The same ground was traveled over then that he travels over here to-day, and the Committee of the Whole voted him down then, as I trust it will do to-day.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] a question. I have listened attentively to his remarks, to learn just how this expenditure is to benefit navigation in the harbor of New Orleans. I understood the gentleman to say that the work consists of a series of submerged spurs in the bed of the river, but how does that benefit navigation? Is it not merely to protect the bank?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I never have stated, nor does the report of the committee state, that there was any need of work in the harbor of New Orleans for the purpose of deepening the water. But what is a harbor? It is a place where vessels find a port, where they can be moored, and it must have facilities for their mooring. Those facilities are constructed and provided by the municipality. But here is the Mississippi River, the property of the United States, which threatens destruction to the mooring-grounds there, to the facilities provided for the commerce and shipping of a great harbor where rides the commerce of a dozen or more States and Territories of this Union. The benefit is not local to New Orleans or its people. All the great country drained by the river and its tributaries is interested in this work. Let the mooring-places for the ships and vessels be destroyed, let the facilities provided for the commerce and shipping of this great port be swept away by the forces of the river, and what avail would be the navigation of the harbor. If we can dredge a harbor to deepen it, we can equally curb the forces of the water within that harbor to prevent the destruction of the aids to navigation and commerce placed there. These aids to commerce and shipping are as necessary to navigation, in the commercial sense of that term, as depth of water is.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] was seriously mistaken in supposing that any one has said this work is to result in benefit to the harbor. The engineer, on page 2974 of the report, says:

The effect of this work—

That is, the sinking of two of the submerged spurs—can not be known until the falling of the river diminishes the current sufficiently to permit accurate soundings to be taken in depths of 100 feet.

So that the very man in charge of this work has no knowledge now as to what the effect of this work is to be. I understood the gentleman to say that $100,000 was the meager sum asked to continue and complete this work.

Mr. BLANCHARD. At Goldsborough Bend.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah! the gentleman did not say that before. The revised estimate, as contained in the last report, in addition to the sums already expended, is $654,000. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Louisiana how the expenditure of that sum and the building of these dikes was to affect in any way the vessels that come into that harbor. Here is now a depth of 100 feet of water. Here is now the width that has been there all these years. Suppose the banks cave; suppose that some of the property on the bank falls into the river. How does that affect the navigation of the river? How does that affect the vessels that are to be moored there from year to year? There is still a depth of 100 feet; there is still a half-mile in breadth; there are still the same possibilities of anchorage, if vessels ever anchor there. I confess, if this is not a harbor, and if vessels tie up there to a "stubbing-post," just as they do at landings along the river, the caving-in of the banks might interfere a little with the integrity and permanency of the stubbing-post. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that this work at the harbor of New Orleans is one of great importance, and one which I have examined personally. I am clearly convinced in my own mind of its very great importance to the commerce of that port.

The gentleman seems to proceed upon the assumption that the only thing needed for a harbor is depth of water. Why, sir, there is ample depth of water in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean; but that does not afford a harbor. There is ample depth of water in the middle of the Mississippi River at New Orleans; but that does not afford a harbor.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman believe it will require less money to make at New Orleans a permanent harbor, such as he calls a harbor, than it would require to make one in the middle of the Atlantic?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman can answer that question for himself.

Now, we know perfectly well that commerce can not find a foothold or lodging-place unless there is a harbor having stability as well as depth of water. Gentlemen make no objection when we provide for breakwaters to prevent the storms and currents of the ocean from rushing into our harbors situated nearer the coast. We thus prevent the destruction of shipping, the wrecking of wharves, and all the other appurtenances of commerce. Why, then, should objection be made when at this great port we seek so to regulate and control the majestic current of the Mississippi as to provide a suitable place for the transactions of commerce? Why, sir, there could not be a port on the Mississippi with any adequate facilities for the transaction of business on a large scale unless at the selected ports, worthy to be dignified by the name, we give such protection as we give to every seaport in the country.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Before debate on this part of the bill is closed I desire, with the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole, to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the desirability of having the committee rise at this time, and also of giving permission that such amendments as members may wish to offer to this paragraph of the bill be printed in the RECORD. I trust this proposition will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. I accept the gentleman's suggestion. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may now send their amendments to the desk to be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that gentlemen desiring to offer amendments may now send them up to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HEPBURN. That will not preclude the offering of further amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

The following are the amendments submitted to be printed in the RECORD:

By Mr. WARNER, of Ohio:

First. Strike out the words "Mississippi River Commission" and "commission" wherever they occur in the paragraph on pages 47 and 48 of the bill and insert "Secretary of War."

Second. At the end of line 1152 add: "Provided, That a committee, to consist of five members of the House, shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the work of the Mississippi River Commission and to report thereon before the end of the session, with such recommendation as it may deem proper. Said committee shall also examine and report upon the jetties at the mouth of the river, and especially whether mud lumps are forming beyond the jetties and what depth of channel is kept open at and beyond the mouth of the river."

To come in after the word "five," in line 1155:

And the Secretary of War shall cause soundings to be made for a distance of not less than 5 miles beyond the jetties at the mouth of the river to ascertain whether mud lumps are forming and to what extent bars are forming and what depth of channel is maintained all the way to the deep waters of the Gulf, and to report the results of such examination to Congress at the next session.

By Mr. LITTLE (to come in at the proper place):

SEC. —. If, during the first ten days of the session or sessions of Congress after the passage of this act, the President shall be satisfied that it would be detrimental to the public interests or a wasteful expenditure of public money to apply any specific appropriation herein, or unexpended balance thereof, exceeding $25,000 in amount, to the purpose or purposes for which appropriated, he shall direct the withholding of the same from use and forthwith transmit to the House of Representatives a full statement of his reasons therefor. And thereupon, subject to the right of each House to determine the rules of its proceedings, the question of continuing such appropriation or unexpended balance thereof shall be submitted to the House of Representatives, and, if decided in the affirmative, shall be transmitted, together with said statement, to the Senate and submitted thereto. If the two Houses concur in continuing such appropriation or unexpended balance, the same shall thereupon again become available for said purpose or purposes; otherwise it shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH offered the following:

Add at the end of line 1130 the following:

"And provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available for any improvement other than the removal of obstructions from, and the dredging of, said river, and the completion of unfinished works thereon the discontinuance of which would, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, work a material injury to commerce, until the plan of such improvement, with estimates of the expense thereof, shall have been submitted to the President and by him approved, and then only to the extent, to be designated by him, necessary for the improvement thus having his approval."

By Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas:

Amend by striking out lines 1127 to 1130.

Mr. WILLIS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that it insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill (H. R. 6429) granting a pension to Eunice E. Clark, agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. COLQUITT as managers of said conference on its part.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKINSON: Petition of Grange No. 368, of Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of a law to suppress imitation dairy products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Keel, of Jackson County; and of Leonard Green, asking reference of their several claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of Capt. W. J. Duley, to accompany House bill 7488—to the Committee on Pensions.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Of citizens of Essex County, Massachusetts.

By Mr. CLARDY: Of citizens of Saint Louis, Mo.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 30, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, in accordance with the requirements of the act of July 15, 1870, a full and complete inventory of the property belonging to the United States in the buildings, rooms, offices, and grounds occupied by that Department; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Rev. A. A. Lewis, of Evinston, Fla., praying that an appropriation of $100 per capita be made to be expended under the direction of the American Colonization Society for expenses of colored emigrants to Liberia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of dairymen and butter-makers of Lexington, Ky., praying for the passage of the bill placing the manufacture and sale of all imitations of butter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and taxing it at 10 cents a pound; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition of certain Indians, praying for payment to certain of the Cherokees for their removal and subsistence, and for the removal of other Cherokees to the Indian Territory. The petition is signed by the Indian agent, Robert L. Owen; it is also signed by John Taylor, who represents himself to be the agent and attorney of the Indians in North Carolina, in behalf of the object I have stated. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of a meeting of Friends in Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of the bill to promote peace among nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARRISON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the employment on public works of prison-contract labor; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of John McKnight and 640 other ex-soldiers and citizens of Harrison County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the House bill No. 3320, granting a pension to all United States soldiers of the war of the rebellion, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the officers of the Industrial Christian Home Association of Utah Territory praying that a donation of $100,000 be made to that institution; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of M. McCrackin & Co., and a number of other citizens of Fairfield, Iowa, interested in dairy products, praying for the enactment of a law placing the manufacture and sale of all imitations of butter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and taxing them at 10 cents a pound. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Parsons, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of butter-makers and dairymen of Grand Gorge, N. Y., praying that a tax of 10 cents per pound be placed on all imitations of butter; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BODIES FOR DISSECTION—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. VANCE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up the bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves, which has hitherto passed the two Houses of Congress and has been returned by the President with a message giving his reasons why he can not approve the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, calls up the bill named by him. The bill is before the Senate, and the question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee upon which the bill was passed and of the President's message. That is all that I propose to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President has been already read. The report of the committee will be read at the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted in the House of Representatives by Mr. FORD, March 4, 1886:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill S. 349, having considered the same, report as follows:

The report made on said bill and submitted to the Senate states fully the objects and necessity for its passage, with which your committee agree, and herewith incorporate the same as a part of their report, as follows:

The object of this bill is to provide sufficient dissecting material for the medical colleges of the District of Columbia, and to afford better protection to the graves of the dead from desecration. The report made on said bill and submitted to the House of Representatives states fully the objects and the necessity for its passage, with which your committee agree, and herewith incorporate the same as a part of their report, as follows:

"The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred —— entitled 'A bill for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves,' having had the same under consideration, report it back with a favorable recommendation.

"The object of the bill is twofold: First and chiefly, to provide sufficient dissecting material for the medical colleges of the District of Columbia; and secondly, and indirectly, to afford better protection to the graves of the dead from desecration.

"There are now several flourishing medical schools in Washington well established, and one or more of them of long standing. It is known to all that such institutions can not be carried on or proper training for the practice of medicine and surgery be given without ample experience in the dissection of the human cadaver. This fact is recognized and approved by all, and yet public opinion as strongly approves and demands stringent laws for the punishment of the desecration of graves in order to procure the necessary dissecting materials. Hence, the laws of the District are very severe, and properly so, against the crime of grave-robbing. With such laws in operation and such necessities for the schools of medicine, the authorities of the District are compelled either to wink at this offense or seriously to cripple, if not to destroy, the efficiency and success of these schools. Furthermore, the heads of these institutions, professors, and students of science are compelled to supply their admitted necessities by confederating with and employing professional grave-robbers, and constantly to incur the risk of detection and criminal prosecution; and it being known in a community that the trade of resurrecting bodies for dissection is a common one, kindred and friends are frequently tortured with anxiety lest the hand of the resurrectionists shall remove the bodies of their dead.

"This bill is intended to relieve from such fears, to do away with the necessity or temptation of violating the laws, and at the same time in an open and legal way to provide the requisite dissecting material for the study and advancement of anatomical science in the District. A careful comparison with the statutes of some of the States shows its provisions to be prudently and aptly framed, and intended to accomplish the purpose in view in a manner as little repellant to public sentiment and sensibility as practicable."

For the above reasons your committee return said bill with the recommendation that it do pass, and that H. R. 2632 lie on the table.

Mr. VANCE. It will be perceived that the objections made to the bill are of a technical character. In the first place, to the proviso which requires that the dead bodies of paupers should be claimed by any friend or relation upon satisfying the authorities of the bona fides of such relationship, the objection is that the word "authorities" does not sufficiently define the officers who are to be satisfied of this fact before surrendering the body. By looking at the bill it will be seen, I think, that these authorities are sufficiently defined in the opening words, to wit:

That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense, said bodies to be distributed among the several colleges equitably, the number assigned to each being proportioned to that of its students.

Now, the proviso is as follows:

Provided, however, That if the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord, requested to be buried; or if, within forty-eight hours after his death, any person claiming to be, and satisfying the authorities that he is, a relative by blood or marriage, or friend of the deceased, asks to have the body buried; or if such deceased person was a stranger or traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

I think that the word "authorities" in the proviso would refer to those mentioned in the opening words of the bill, so that it could hardly be true that the authorities who were to exercise this discretion of delivering the body were not sufficiently defined by the bill. That is the principal objection.

The other objection is to the fact that the physician who receives from the authorities the dead body is required to give a bond that the body shall be used for nothing but scientific purposes, and afterward shall be decently buried; that the physician is required to give bond instead of the medical college. That is the second technical objection. Whether that is sufficient to defeat the bill or not I leave it to the judgment of Senators to say.

The bill is one of very considerable importance, in the interest of humanity and of public decency, as tending to furnish scientific colleges in a lawful and decent way with sufficient subjects for their purposes, and to prevent thereby the necessary and disgusting occupation of robbing the graves of the dead, which is generally resorted to for these purposes. I submit, therefore, without further remark, whether the bill should be passed notwithstanding the President's veto on these technical grounds or not.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think all the Senators were present when the message of the President of the United States was sent to the Senate. It seems to me it is a courtesy due the Executive as well as proper that Senators should hear the message read before we vote upon it, and I therefore ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President of the United States will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith return Senate bill No. 349, entitled "An act for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves," without my approval.

The purpose of this bill is to permit the delivery of certain dead bodies to the medical colleges located in the District of Columbia for dissection.

Such disposition of the bodies of unknown and pauper dead is only excused by the necessity of acquiring by this means proper and useful anatomical knowledge, and the laws by which it is permitted should, in deference to a decent and universal sentiment, carefully guard against abuse and needless offense.

The measure under consideration does not, with sufficient care, specify and limit the officers and the parties who it is proposed to invest with discretion in the disposition of dead bodies remaining in the institutions and places mentioned in the bill. The second section indicates an intention to prevent the use of said bodies for any other purpose than the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and to secure, after such use, the decent burial of the remains. It declares that a bond shall be given providing for the performance of these conditions. But instead of exacting the bond from the medical colleges, to which alone, by the terms of the first section, the bodies are to be delivered, such bond is required of "every physician or surgeon before receiving such dead body."

The bill also provides that a relative by blood or marriage, or a friend, may, within forty-eight hours after death, demand that any body be buried, upon satisfying "the authorities" of the relationship claimed to the deceased.

The "authorities" to be thus satisfied should be clearly defined; and the determination of a question so important should be left with those only who will perform this duty with proper care and consideration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. VANCE. The yeas and nays will be called?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Constitution requires the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken by yeas and nays under the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose there is no Senator and no intelligent citizen who doubts that it is desirable to afford opportunity for an anatomical and scientific knowledge of the structure of the human frame by surgical examination and dissection of the dead bodies. I remember in a famous speech in the British Parliament on some kindred subject an eminent statesman and orator declared that one of the early sovereigns of Austria, I think Duke Leopold, was wounded on the field of battle and that the whole surgical skill of Europe could not afford a better means of treating him than cutting off the wounded limb with an ax or a hatchet, from which operation the duke died.

Now the poorest hod-carrier who falls from a ladder, the poorest operative who gets entangled in the machinery of a mill, receives in all our principal cities, without money and without price, the attendance of a surgical skill which all Europe could not have afforded to the man highest in rank in the world at any price a hundred years ago.

It is therefore in the interest of the poor, the destitute, the sick, that this opportunity for the promotion of surgical science should be afforded, and I have no hesitation in supporting any measure, whatever prejudice it may encounter, which holds that end properly in view, because I know that I am voting in behalf of the interests of humanity where humanity is in most need.

But at the same time that proceeding should be accompanied with every regard for the interested feeling of friends, relatives, and kindred, especially in the case of the poor and the unfortunate who die in public institutions apart, where they have not the tender care of their immediate relations. It is a sad thing, especially for men who have seen better days, to die absent from all the friends who had cared for them in life. It is the great desire and want and yearning of humanity that there should be a security for decent and reverent burial, and that the person's departure from life should be surrounded by the love and care of sympathizing friends.

> On some fond breast the parting soul relies;
> Some pious drops the closing eye requires.

The President of the United States under his official responsibility thinks the present bill is not sufficient in respect to the safeguards which it exacts for the reverent and tender care of persons who die in protecting their bodies from an invasion which may be a shock to surviving relatives when the fact is ascertained. Without going into a discussion whether the committee are right or the President is right, it seems to me that if we have passed a bill which leaves that question so far doubtful that so high an official of the Government thinks that further security is required and demanded by the reverence due to the form of humanity, it is proper that we should defeat this bill and reconsider our action; and without wishing to put any imputation upon the committee or even to express any certainty of conviction that the President is right, I shall vote against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HALE. Can we have the bill read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense, said bodies to be distributed among the several colleges equitably, the number assigned to each being proportioned to that of its students: Provided, however, That if the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord, requested to be buried; or if, within forty-eight hours after his death, any person claiming to be, and satisfying the authorities that he is, a relative by blood or marriage, or friend of the deceased, asks to have the body buried; or if such deceased person was a stranger or traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

SEC. 2. That every physician or surgeon, before receiving such dead body, shall give to the officers surrendering the same to him a sufficient bond that each body shall be used only for the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and that after having been so used the remains thereof shall be decently buried; and whosoever shall use such body or bodies for any purpose other than that aforesaid, or shall remove the same beyond the limits of the said District of Columbia, and whoever shall sell or buy such body or bodies, or in any way traffic in the same, or who shall disturb or remove bodies from graves in which they have been buried, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for a term not less than two nor more than three years, at hard labor, in the District (or city) jail.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the object and purpose of the bill is to prevent the desecration of graves by those who are in search of material for the purpose of promoting anatomical science. The necessity for some such legislation will be apparent to those who are familiar with the revolting disclosures of the past ten years in this city, where the graves of many reputable persons who had been tenderly buried by their surviving relatives were found subsequently to have been opened by those who are engaged in this horrible pursuit.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. A similar bill has been repeatedly passed by the Senate at previous sessions. It is unnecessary for me to say that I have no pride of opinion whatever about the matter; and if upon inspection of the bill the objections of the President appear to be well founded, or if there be a reasonable doubt whether the bill is properly guarded, then I hope the Senate will not agree to pass the bill over the objections of the Executive.

The criticisms of the President appear to be directed to two particulars. In the first place, he states that the authorities upon whom the demand for the burial of a body may be made are not sufficiently specified. The first section of the bill declares:

That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense.

That is the only class to which the provisions of the bill apply. The exceptions appear to me to be well guarded. In the first place:

If the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord, requested to be buried; or if, within forty-eight hours after his death, any person claiming to be, and satisfying the authorities that he is, a relative by blood or marriage, or friend, of the deceased, asks to have the body buried; or if such deceased person was a stranger or a traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

So that, under the provisions of the bill, at least forty-eight hours must elapse after death before delivery can be made to the persons entitled to receive the bodies. Or if the deceased person was a stranger or a traveler who suddenly died, then, in that event, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

It appears to me that the objections of the Executive are not well founded; that the authorities upon whom this demand is to be made are clearly defined, and that the persons whose bodies are to be delivered after death are solely confined to the class who would be buried at public expense otherwise.

But the committee saw fit to place still further safeguards around the bill, and they therefore provided that before any such dead bodies shall be received a bond shall be given to the authorities of the District of Columbia, and that after having been used for the purposes of science the remains shall be decently interred.

If there is anything left unguarded, if there is anything by which the sensibilities of survivors could be unnecessarily wounded, or if there is anything by which the full measure of respect to the dead is not maintained, I should argree that the objections of the President were sufficient and ought to be sustained. But in view of the fact that in the past ten years graveyards have been desecrated, graves have been opened and rifled, and surviving relations have been horrified to discover that the remains of their friends had been surreptitiously removed, I should hope that upon light and frivolous considerations the Senate would not decline to provide for some lawful and appropriate manner in which this necessary demand of subjects for anatomical science can be supplied from a class of persons who would be otherwise buried at the public expense, and which can be done without injury to the feelings of survivors, and with a sufficient guard against the possibility of delivering over to the authorities the body of any person dying suddenly by accident, a stranger in the city, or a traveler having no friends by whom his body could be reclaimed.

I do not find upon inspection of the brief message of the President that there are any other objections than those to which I have referred, and inasmuch as the object of the bill is primarily not to procure subjects for anatomical science but really to protect those who are properly buried and prevent the desecration of graveyards and the rifling of graves, I trust that the Senate will see fit to pass the bill notwithstanding the objections of the President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I was not present in the Senate when the bill was passed, or if I was, my attention was not called to it. I supposed when I came in this morning and found what was under consideration that the provisions of the bill were confined to criminals who had suffered the extreme penalty of the law and who had no particular relatives to claim their bodies; but I find upon reading the bill that it applies to every person who, from indigent circumstances, is compelled to go to a hospital, to an almshouse, or to any place where the poor are provided for. If they die and make no request that they be buried and have no friend near to make a request for the delivery of their bodies for burial, then the bodies of such people are to be handed over to the colleges for the purpose of dissection. To that I am opposed.

It is known that there are many worthy people, indigent it is true, poor, helpless, and friendless, who are compelled to seek a home in the asylums of the country; and is the Congress of the United States to say that by reason of their poverty, by reason of their indigent circumstances, their bodies shall be delivered over upon death to colleges for the purposes of dissection?

Sir, I shall not vote for such a bill, whether it is for the purpose of promoting science or whether it is for the purpose of protecting the graves of other deceased people. These people are entitled to our sympathy living, and they should have our respect and our protection when they are dead.

For one, I am glad that the President of the United States has sent the bill back with his objections, and I hope the Senate will sustain the veto of the President. I place it not upon the ground which the President places it, but I place it upon the broad and higher ground of common humanity, which should cause us to protect those who from indigent circumstances are placed at our disposal.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I only wish to say that it seems to me if the attempt had been made to prevent the indigent and diseased persons of this country from ever entering into a hospital or charitable institution, this bill would have achieved that purpose. If there is anything revolting to the human race, even in a condition of barbarism, it is that the body should be subjected to the ruthless hands and the unfeeling knife of the surgeon. Even when an appeal is made to relatives in the name of science, such an appeal as the Senator from Massachusetts has spoken of here to-day, it is only when those relatives can rise above the ordinary feelings of humanity that the body of a loved one can be given up to the surgeon's knife.

Sir, the poor and indigent, for whose benefit these charitable institutions have been erected, it seems to me would rather die upon the street or upon the commons than go to a hospital under the provisions of this bill, knowing that at the end of a life of poverty and misery the body would not even be respected after death. This of itself is enough to induce me to oppose the bill, however good the motive may be, and I question not the motives with which the bill has been introduced.

But in addition to that, if anything technical could be brought here in such a case, the bill is not, it seems to me, sufficiently guarded. As the President has stated in his veto message, there is no definition of the authorities who are to be satisfied in regard to the use that is to be made of the body after death.

In the exception as to the case of a person who, before dying, shall make a request in regard to the disposition of his body, there is no provision as to how that request is to be authenticated. Take but one simple case which occurs almost every day, and certainly weekly in the United States; take the case of some poor unfortunate, who from feelings of delicacy conceals his name in order to hide the disgrace of dying in a hospital; in a distant city he is stricken down and, after a lingering sickness, he dies in want in some charitable institution. In forty-eight hours, if no relative appears, he is thrown into the hands of the surgeons and hacked to pieces in the interest of science. In one week afterward a wife, a mother, a father may find where this poor unfortunate has died, and has no opportunity to reclaim his body and have the poor privilege of weeping above his grave.

Sir, I can not vote for a bill with any such provision as that.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I had no idea this bill would call forth such a burst of eloquent humanity. I am overwhelmed by it, when grave Senators with so much eloquence portray the inhumanity that is to be perpetrated upon a man which the man himself could avert by simply saying that he did not want to be cut up by the doctors after death. It seems to me that they are exerting much more care for him than he sees proper to exert for himself.

If the bill is to be rejected on principles of this kind it is simply equivalent to saying that under no circumstances shall the human body ever be delivered to professors of anatomical science, and that grave-robbing shall be continued forever or else science must forego its efforts to come to a knowledge of the human frame.

The paupers who are taken to an almshouse can procure themselves a decent burial at the expense of the public when they die by simply making the request of the proper authorities that their bodies shall not be given to the authorities. If it is more humane to permit their graves to be rifled after death, then the bill is wrong on its merits, and without regard to the technical objections of the Executive it ought to be rejected by the Senate.

But if it is more humane, if it is more decent, if it is more conducive to the interests of those of us who are yet alive and those who shall hereafter live in this world, to make use of their bodies in this legal, decent way, it seems to me that it is impossible to conceive a bill more humane and more properly and strictly guarded. If the person has any relatives or connection by blood or marriage who shall come forward and request that his body shall be buried it shall not be delivered to the surgeons. If he has any friends who shall come forward and make that request the body shall not be delivered. If, having neither kindred nor friends in this world, he shall himself say to the superintendent of the hospital that he does not wish his body to be dissected it shall not be done, says the bill.

It seems to me that these reflections upon the humanity of the bill are entirely uncalled-for. The President himself did not raise them. His objections were purely technical, and as they have been commented upon by myself and by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I will not say anything further.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I sympathize with what the Senator from North Carolina has said concerning the necessity of some provision of this description, and I was inclined at the first blush to vote with him for the passage of the bill, the veto notwithstanding. But I wish to make a criticism upon the provisions.

That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers.

That is very indefinite—any person with any degree of authority, not in the asylum alone, not in the almshouse alone, but in any hospital, even the best of them—having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent—

That is too indefinite—of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense—

The person to be buried at the public expense may by no means be a pauper—said bodies to be distributed among the colleges, &c.

Provided, however, That if the deceased person during his last illness, of his own accord, requested to be buried, or if within forty-eight hours after—

Any relative may claim the body, &c. I can suppose very easily a case that I think will determine any person to vote against the bill, a case not singular either. A stranger comes here, an entirely respectable and worthy stranger, neither a criminal nor a pauper. He suffers under some severe accident or is taken with some severe disease which makes the exercise of his mental powers somewhat clouded and difficult. He does not think of it and he is not informed concerning this law. It is not made the duty of any officer of the asylum or hospital to ask him the delicate question whether he is willing to be cut up or not, nor is the precise period indicated at which that question shall be asked. It is the announcement of the sentence of death upon the prisoner. Perhaps nobody expects his sudden death. Perhaps he does request that his relatives may be notified, but who shall be sure that the nurse or officer he directs will do it? Who shall be sure that the telegram gets there? Who shall be sure that the family is at home when the telegram arrives? It would be the easiest imaginable thing to find that possibly one of our nearest friends may be in the hands of the dissecting surgeon before the family shall have any notice of it, a person of means if you choose, of the highest character. But whether with means or without means, of high character or poorer character, the bill is not sufficiently guarded. The purpose is one that is entirely approved of by everybody; but there are not sufficient guards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called.

Mr. SABIN. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 48; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. GEDDES, and Mr. J. T. JOHNSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1357) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. A petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, praying for relief for Esther A. Keyser, which has been considered by that committee, and a bill prepared in conformity therewith according to the best judgment of the committee and, I may also add, of the District commissioners, to whom the matter was referred. I ask that the bill be read the first and second time and placed on the Calendar, and that the petition lie on the table.

The bill (S. 2291) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser was read twice by its title.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1187) to amend an act incorporating the proprietors of Prospect Hill Cemetery, approved June 13, 1860, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1916) authorizing the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from the State of Colorado to the Territory of Utah, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to report back the bill (S. 101) to amend sections 2475 and 2476 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park, with certain amendments, and to move that the bill as proposed to be amended be printed and recommitted to that committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2219) to reduce the license tax of produce dealers at large and in the several markets, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 6975) to establish additional life-saving stations favorably, with two amendments. As the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service ought to know early what the action of Congress is to be, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be put on its passage now.

Mr. BLAIR. I have a report to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made by the presentation of morning business.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 40) providing for the payment of per diem laborers in Government employ on the 30th of May of each year as on other days, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 660) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 138) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1601) to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 2292) to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONGER. Now I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill I reported, House bill 6975.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

Mr. PIKE. I must object to the consideration of that bill. This morning was assigned for the consideration of claims bills on the Calendar.

Mr. DAWES. I ask leave to present a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Michigan. Morning business being offered, it is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw the report. I should like when the bill is reported to have it considered and passed at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the report, and will make it at some other time.

Mr. PIKE. I do not object if it will not take time.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I present the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 12, 13, 25, 44, and 52.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 32, 33, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 54, 56, 62, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, and 76, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,528,900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For support and civilization of the Navajo Indians, including pay of employés, $7,500; for expenses of constructing ditches and reservoirs, $7,500; in all, $15,000, to be taken from the funds now in the Treasury belonging to said Indians."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$650,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$55,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$715,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 77: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That funds herein and heretofore appropriated for construction of ditches and other works for irrigating may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be expended in open market: Provided further, That purchases in open market may be made from Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to an amount not exceeding $3,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

H. L. DAWES,
P. B. PLUMB,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
OLIN WELLBORN,
S. W. PEEL,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what the report of the committee is in regard to the amendment of the Senate increasing the amount of the appropriation for industrial schools in Alaska?

Mr. DAWES. That has been agreed to by both branches.

The report was concurred in.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey showing the progress made in said survey during the year ending June 30, 1885, for distribution by said superintendent.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the bill (H. R. 4688) granting a pension to Josephine Da Costa Thomas be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. The bill was reported by mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The Chair calls attention to the fact that the Senate by unanimous consent made a special order for this day.

Mr. FRYE. The order of the introduction of bills has not yet been called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will look and see what the nature of the order is.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the order for to-day?

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is now in order. The Chair supposed it had been called before 1 o'clock.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2293) granting a pension to Hannah C. De Witt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2294) granting a pension to Hamilton Elliott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 2295) to muster Jesse H. Strickland as colonel of cavalry into the service of the United States, and to pay him for his services from January 30, 1863, to March 31, 1864, inclusive; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2296) relating to the disposition of the hot water on the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. CONGER. I will now report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 6975) to establish additional life-saving stations, which I reported this morning and recalled, and let it be placed on the Calendar. I will take another day to ask the Senate to take it up and consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

CONSIDERATION OF CLAIMS BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the order of the Senate is the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB. Can that order be set aside by a majority vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order can, perhaps, be set aside by a vote. The Chair will ask the Secretary to read the order as made, and then Senators will understand it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from the RECORD of Wednesday, April 28:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent of the Senate that on Friday morning next, after the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bills indicated by him, the claims bills.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose that will confine the Senator to the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. To what class of bills does the Senator's request apply?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will please state the bills he proposes to consider at the time indicated.

Mr. PIKE. Such as have been reported by the Committee on Claims at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that only lasts to 2 o'clock, and that being so I shall not make objection or bring the Post-Office appropriation bill up now. At that time I will move it, and I wish to say, simply to anticipate the usual motion on Friday to adjourn over to Monday, that I hope that motion will not be made to-day; but that the Senate will sit to-morrow, in order that, if we do not conclude the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill to-day, its consideration may be concluded to-morrow, so as to have it out of the way during this week.

I will say as one reason why I desire to have that done that I am under constraint to leave the city at the earliest hour possible, and as soon as that bill is concluded I shall go away to be absent for a week or so. I hope therefore the Senate will be inclined to sit to-morrow, and thereby make sure of getting through with the Post-Office appropriation bill this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first claims bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say that this order was made for the convenience of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], that there are one or two claims bills here which are under my charge, and at the consideration of which I suppose he does not specially care to be present; but I will not claim the indulgence of the Senate for the consideration of those bills until after the bills the Senator from New Hampshire desires to have considered shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What bills does the Senators from New Hampshire desire taken up first?

Mr. HOAR. I refer to the first bill on the Calendar. I will not ask that that be taken up.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. PIKE. I ask to take up Order of Business 52, being Senate bill 18.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the amendments agreed to. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, State of Tennessee, the sum of $3,100, in full compensation for property taken from him for the use of and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear it read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. PIKE from the Committee on Claims, January 13, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., having considered the same, present herewith the following report:

This claim was considered by the Committee on Claims at the Forty-eighth Congress, and they made a report prepared by Mr. PIKE, as follows, which the present committee adopt:

"[Senate Report No. 332, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 896) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

"On the breaking out of the rebellion, Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was the owner of the steamer New National, of about 480 tons burden, and was engaged in regular business with said boat on the Mississippi River.

"At the outbreak of the rebellion she was impressed by the confederates into their service without and against the consent of Montgomery, as he alleges. She continued in the service of the confederates from that time to June 6, 1862, when Memphis was captured by the Union forces. She was at Memphis on that day under orders from the confederate authorities to proceed down the river. Said orders were not obeyed, but after the fight Chief Clerk Nicholas M. Johnson, under the direction of said Montgomery, as he alleges, went on board the monitor Benton and delivered the New National to Admiral Davis, and Capt. Alexander Grant, of the Navy, was immediataly placed in command of her, and she entered upon the services of the United States with the full consent of said Montgomery, as he alleges.

"She continued in said service from June 6, 1862, to March 20, 1863, a space of two hundred and eighty-eight days, at the expiration of which time she was turned over to said Montgomery by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and thereupon he chartered her for one year to Admiral Porter, at the rate of $50 a day, and for a second year at the rate of $65 a day.

"The said Montgomery now asks that he be paid at the rate of $50 a day for the two hundred and eighty-eight days the New National was in the service of the United States, under the command of Captain Grant, amounting to the sum of $14,400.

"While the New National was so held, and before March 20, 1863, she was libeled in the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois under the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes.'

"December 17, 1862, the district attorney for the southern district of Illinois, L. Weldon, wrote to the Solicitor of the Treasury as follows:

"'A few days since I obtained in the district court of this district a decree of condemnation against two steamers, the Kentucky and the New National. The ground of condemnation is that they carried on traffic in violation of the act of July 13, 1862, and the President's proclamation of August 16, 1861.

"'The claimants have given notice of appeal to the circuit court, and intend, also, to make an appeal to the Treasury Department for remission of the penalty. My judgment is that in the case of the New National, especially, no relief should be given.

"'The claimant has taken an oath of allegiance to the rebel government, and made some statements, as shown by the testimony, tending to show him at heart a disloyal man. The testimony on which he predicates his defense is taken without cross-examination and without any evidence as to the truthfulness of his witnesses.

"'I have taken great trouble and expense in preparing these cases for trial; having been as far south as Memphis in taking proof. I am thoroughly satisfied, from what I know or have heard outside of the legitimate proof of the case, that the New National is a fit subject of prize and capture.'

"The following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase, to the Solicitor of the Treasury, Edward Jordan, gives a further history of the case. The letter is dated January 16, 1863:

"'Capt. Pearson Montgomery, master and owner of the steamer New National, seized and recently condemned in the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois, under the act of July 13, 1861, has made his petition before me for the remission of said seizure and release of the boat. The complete record in the case, together with a statement of United States District Judge Treat, and the evidence, are presented. From these it appears to my satisfaction that Captain Montgomery was not of his own will in the rebel service with his boat, and that, so soon as he could, he escaped therefrom and voluntarily turned her over to the Federal authorities. * * * I conceive that the discretionary power conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury of mitigating or remitting forfeitures in cases of this nature should be used to extend relief to loyal persons and to lighten the hardships of the war so far as consists with the public interest.

"'In this view of the case, and for the reasons above stated, I feel justified in extending such relief as lies in my power to the petitioner, upon the usual terms. You will accordingly please instruct the proper district attorney to dismiss said suit and further proceedings against said steamer upon these conditions, namely, that the claimant shall pay all costs of whatsoever character incurred by the seizure and judicial proceedings, together with a fee of $100 to the United States district attorney, and agree that certificate of probable cause of seizure shall issue from the court for the protection of the seizing officer.'

"Accordingly the proceedings in the circuit court were dismissed and an order made in accordance with the Secretary's letter, as appears of record in said court.

"In 1880 Captain Montgomery presented his claim for $14,400 to the Treasury Department. May 25, 1880, a decision was rendered by the Third Auditor on the case, rejecting it, and in July of the same year the Second Comptroller made a long examination of the case and rejected it. Captain Montgomery made two points, first, that the boat was not forfeited because it did not ply between ports one declared to be in a section that was in insurrection and a port not in such a section. He maintained that though the boat did run between New Orleans, La., and Columbus, Ky., both ports weere in the insurrectionary sections, even though Columbus had not been so declared by the President's proclamation of August 16, 1861.

"The above-mentioned proclamation declared, among other States, Louisiana to be in a state of insurrection, but did not so declare as to Columbus, Ky.

"The law authorizing such proclamation is in the act of July 13, 1861, and is as follows:

"'SEC. 5. It shall be lawful, &c., * * * for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares, and merchandise coming from said State or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such State or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such State or section, be forfeited to the United States.

"'SEC. 6. That from and after fifteen days after the issuing of said proclamation, as provided in the last foregoing section of this act, any ship or vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizens or inhabitant of said State or part of a State whose inhabitants are so declared in a state of insurrection, found at sea, or in any port of the rest of the United States, shall be forfeited to the United States.'

"It will be readily seen that the Treasury Department could not legally decide this point different from what it did.

"Captain Montgomery's second point was that the remission of the forfeiture by the Secretary of the Treasury not only restored to him his vessel, but the right to recover for her services from the time she was first seized.

"Secretary Chase does not seem to have considered in his above letter that the remission of the forfeiture went to that extent. His power of remission arose under section 8 of the act of July 13, 1861, which is as follows:

"'That the forfeitures and penalties incurred by virtue of this act may be mitigated or remitted in pursuance of the authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by the act entitled "An act providing for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned, approved March 3, 1797," or in cases where special circumstances may seem to require it, according to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.'

"The statute of March 3, 1797, gives power to the Secretary to stay the prosecution and remit the penalty, if one has been imposed, but it goes no further. There is no power in the statute, express or implied, whereby the Secretary could restore to Captain Montgomery the right to be paid for the services of his boat while under the decree of forfeiture.

"The Treasury Department could not do otherwise than overrule Captain Montgomery's second point.

"Under that head he also claimed that there was an implied contract on the part of the Government to pay for the boat for these two hundred and eighty-eight days.

"That argument must necessarily fall for the reason that the boat belonged to the Government by force of the statute from the moment it was used in violation of the law and the President's proclamation. It has been held that where a forfeiture is declared by statute in a case like this that the forfeiture becomes complete at the moment the statute is violated.

"Mr. Justice Ballard says:

"The decisions are uniform both in England and the United States. In The United States vs. Fifty-six barrels of whisky, &c., 'that where a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as a penalty for the commission of crime, if the denunciation is in direct terms and not in the alternative, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the Government.'

"And he adds:

"'That the subsequent conviction and judgment are simply the consummation of the proceeding that the law requires to be instituted to ascertain the fact of the forfeiture.' (See also United States vs. Nineteen hundred and sixty bags of coffee, 8 Cranch, 398; Gelston vs. Hoyt, 3 Wheat., 311; Caldwell vs. United States, 8 How., 381; Wood vs. United States, 16 Peters, 362; Henderson Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall., 16.)

"As to the loyalty of Captain Montgomery the testimony is somewhat conflicting, but the committee are inclined to adopt the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Salmon P. Chase, that Captain Montgomery was loyal to the United States Government, and that his acts inconsistent with that were not of his own free will. It appears that as soon as the coercive acts of the confederates were removed he voluntarily surrendered the New National to the United States.

"It can not be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury intended at the time he remitted to Captain Montgomery the forfeiture, and requiring him to pay costs and $100, that he was to have a claim against the Government up to that time for the use of it during the time it was in possession of the Government, and while it was in fact the property of the Government. Such a supposition is simply absurd.

"The remission of the forfeiture can not have the effect of giving the right claimed in this case.

"The statute of March 3, 1797, gives power to the Secretary to stay the prosecution and remit the penalty, if one has been imposed, but it goes no further. It does not confer the power to set aside or reverse the judgment. Its effect is to remit the penalty and restore the property, but the judgment and all its attendant disabilities, except those so remitted, stand, and the claimant is affected thereby.

"But it appears from this case that this remission of the forfeiture was on the 16th day of January, 1863, but that the vessel remained in the use of the Government and was not surrendered to the claimant till the 20th day of March following, a period of sixty-two days. It does not distinctly appear where the boat was during this time. It does not appear but that the Government had the use of it during this time. The claimant alleges that it had, and the evidence tends strongly to show it. This point does not seem to have been considered at all by either the Third Auditor or the Comptroller of the Treasury.

"The committee think it would be just that the claimant should be paid for the use of the boat during this time. After the 20th of March, when the boat came into the possession of Captain Montgomery, the Government paid him $50 a day for the first year, and $65 per day for its use thereafter.

"The committee therefore recommend that the claimant be allowed for the said sixty-two days, at $50 per day, amounting to $3,100; that the bill be amended so as to read for that amount instead of $14,400, and when so amended that it do pass."

Your committee recommend that the accompanying bill be amended by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "fourteen" and "eight," and inserting in place thereof the words "three" and "one;" and when so amended that it pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill passed, and a motion to reconsider was made on the 17th of February last.

Mr. PIKE. I do not object to the reconsideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we had better reconsider, and I want to make some remarks on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I desire that this bill be passed over now, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be passed over.

WILLIAM H. GRAY.

Mr. PIKE. I now ask for the consideration of Order of Business 178, being Senate bill 165.

The bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William H. Gray, or his legal representative, of $648.25, being payment in full to Gray for services rendered to the Government of the United States while under the orders and in the employment of the officers thereof, during the month of December, 1866, and the months of January and February, 1867.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. PIKE February 10, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, having considered the same, submit the following report:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the date of December 21, 1866, directed R. M. Kelley, collector of internal revenue for the seventh district of Kentucky, to make an examination of the distilleries in said district, and if he could not perform the duty in person to send a competent and trustworthy deputy. Under these instructions he appointed the claimant to make the examination and report. The claimant did make the examination in a manner satisfactory to Mr. Kelley and the Government, visiting and examining one hundred and five distilleries, which occupied him from December 28, 1866, to February 16, 1867, a period of fifty-one days. The money actually expended by him for necessary expenses amounted to $444.25; his compensation $204, which account was approved by Collector Kelley.

After having completed the examination the claimant made a full report to Mr. Kelley and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, both of whom stated that the work was done satisfactorily. Mr. Kelley told him to make up his account and he would approve it, and the Commissioner pay it. Some time later the claimant did make out his account, presented it to Mr. Kelley, who approved it, and then he forwarded it to the Commissioner. The Commissioner returned it with a blank form, saying that when it was made out according to this form it would be paid. The claimant made it out accordingly and forwarded it again to the Commissioner, in whose bureau it remained till 1875 before he received any definite answer about it. Then he was informed that his claim was rejected on the ground that Mr. Kelley should have paid him from his own compensation, according to section 3148 United States Revised Statutes, which provides that—

"Each collector shall be authorized to appoint * * * as many deputies as he may think proper, to be by him compensated for their services."

Mr. Gray appealed from this ruling, and in a later consideration of the case by the Revenue Bureau it was held that Mr. Kelley was paid for such special work by special allowances under the provisions of section 3145 of the United States Revised Statutes, which reads:

"The Secretary of the Treasury may make such further allowances from time to time as may be reasonable in cases where, by reason of the territorial extent of the district or the amount of internal taxes collected, or other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances."

It was further held that he should have submitted Mr. Gray's account in his estimates for additional allowances to the Treasury Department, and because Mr. Gray's account did not come to the Department in that way it was not allowed; and, further, that the act of February 8, 1875, providing that "no such allowance shall be made except within one year after such services are performed," left the Department no means then of paying the claim.

It was also stated that the claim should be paid, but that it could not be without further legislation.

It is plainly established that Mr. Kelley did not submit Mr. Gray's account to the Department in his own, because he did not know but that it was just as correct for Mr. Gray to submit his account direct to the Department as it would be for him (Kelley) to send it in with his.

Secretary Bristow, in a letter to the claimant, said:

"While the Department recognizes the justice of compensating you for your services, there is at this time no appropriation available for that purpose, and Congress must pass a special act for your relief before any allowance can be made to you."

In Senate Report 918 of the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, made by Mr. Sheffield, of the Committee on Claims, section 3145 of the United States Revised Statutes is confounded with section 3148. The latter section does provide that collectors shall pay deputies out of their own compensations. But section 3145 provides that extra allowances may be made to collectors in certain cases where it may seem necessary, and the Revenue Bureau, in its last consideration of the case, finds that it was under this section Gray was employed and would have been paid had it not been for the mistake in the manner of the preentation of his account.

It is evident to your committee that Mr. Gray was properly and regularly employed; that he did his work in a manner satisfactory to all concerned; that the amount of the compensation he asks is reasonable; that it has not been paid him because it came to the Department directly from him instead of through Mr. Kelley.

It is undisputed that the Government received the benefit of his labors and expenditures, and your committee are of the opinion that the claimant should be paid, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK W. RUGGLES.

Mr. PIKE. I now call for the consideration of Order of Business 214, being Senate bill 187.

The bill (S. 187) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 11, after the word "adduced," to strike out the word "and" and insert "including that;" and in line 13, after the word "case," to insert "so far as the same may be competent;" so as to make the bill read:

That the claim of Frederick W. Ruggles for losses and damages suffered by him as owner of the cargo and charterer of the schooner Argonaut, in the year 1861, by reason of the seizure and detention of said vessel by the officials of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication: and to that end full authority and jurisdiction are hereby conferred on said court to proceed in the consideration of the testimony which shall be adduced, and including that which has been taken and heard before the British and American mixed commission in the same case, so far as the same may be competent, by or in behalf of said claimant, and to hear and try said case as if it had by right of law and in due and usual course been brought before said court, and to render such judgment therein as shall be found on the facts as proved just and right, in equity as well as in law.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report. Does the Senator ask for the reading of it?

Mr. INGALLS. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire can tell what damage is indemnified by this bill.

Mr. FRYE. I can state. This man is a Nova Scotian. He had a load of fish and other things bound for the West Indies. He was seized by a United States vessel as a prize and carried into New York.

Mr. INGALLS. When?

Mr. FRYE. In 1861, the early part of the war, just as the war broke out. It was tried in the prize court. After a delay of some sixty days it was found that he had been unlawfully and improperly seized.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the ground of seizure?

Mr. FRYE. That he was carrying contraband goods or some kind of goods to the Confederate States in violation of the blockade, which was found to be an entire mistake, and the vessel was released and the cargo surrendered, but the cargo, of course, in the mean time had become destroyed. They gave him a decision but gave no judgment touching damages or costs, and he entered no appeal, because his attorney informed him that there would be, undoubtedly, a commission created which would have jurisdiction of all such cases. There was a commission created; the case was thoroughly tried, and this is one among the published cases. The case, as shown from the evidence, made it perfectly clear that he was entirely innocent himself and that he ought to have received damages for the detention.

Mr. INGALLS. What amount?

Mr. FRYE. I think about $8,000; but the commission held on a demurrer that the court in New York having assumed jurisdiction of the case so far as to discharge him and his vessel, under the peculiarity of the law creating the commission they could not also take jurisdiction, and, therefore, it was thrown out before the commission, and the poor fellow has been in Congress ever since trying to get leave to go to the Court of Claims under the old evidence. I have no doubt that the man is right; I know him myself, personally.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWAY A. GRANT.

The bill (S. 267) for the relief of Edway A. Grant was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Postmaster-General to allow Edway A. Grant, late postmaster at Fargo, Dak., $6,950, being the amount expended by Grant for clerk-hire at the post-office at Fargo, Dak., during the period from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1882, and not allowed in the settlement of his accounts.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, submitted by Mr. PIKE February 17, 1886, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 267) for the relief of Edway A. Grant, having considered the same, submit herewith the following report:

This case was before the last Congress, and was reported upon by this committee.

Your committee adopt the report then made, prepared by Mr. PIKE, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 681, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1972) for the relief of Edway A. Grant, having considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

"That on the 20th day of April, 1875, the claimant was appointed postmaster at Fargo, Dak., then a fourth-class office; that on the 1st day of January, 1879, said office became 'Presidential,' and the claimant was reappointed postmaster, and served until March 31, 1883; that by reason of the rapid growth in population of Fargo and vicinity after the year 1878 the claimant was compelled to increase the clerical force of the office to accommodate the demands of the public; that he applied to the Department frequently for increased allowance for clerk-hire, giving the reasons therefor, but his requests were denied on the ground that the appropriation for clerk-hire was not sufficient to authorize any additional allowance.

"It seems that during the last five years the claimant was postmaster Fargo grew from a country village to a city of 10,000 inhabitants. The gross receipts of the office during the fiscal year 1878-'79 were $5,088.04, and for the year 1882-'83 were $23,217.29, an increase of over four and one-half, showing that the labors of the office had increased in that proportion.

"During the last five years of his term of office the claimant received for salary and expenses $16,710.42; he paid out for clerk-hire $13,051, while only $4,325 was allowed him by the Department for that purpose, making $8,726 that he paid out of his own pocket. Since his resignation the Postmaster-General has allowed him $1,400 of his claim for clerk-hire for 1883, which reduces his claim to $7,326.

"The business of the office required only one clerk during the third quarter of 1878; for the fourth quarter two were required, and two were employed during 1879. In 1880, three were employed; 1881, three the whole year and five the fourth quarter; 1882, five the whole year and six the fourth quarter; the first quarter of 1883 seven were employed. At the expiration of that quarter the claimant resigned, although he had just been reappointed by the President, giving as his reason that he could not afford to keep the office with the small allowance for clerk-hire.

"In compliance with an order from the Post-Office Department Inspector James A. Small examined the office at Fargo for the year 1882, and under the date of March 12, 1883, made his report. He says:

"'The work of the Fargo office is increasing daily, and it will soon be necessary to have the office remodeled and enlarged to meet the requirements of this wonderful, fast-growing town. Mr. Grant, the present incumbent, has expended considerable money in fitting up the office. He has also been to extra expense for clerk-hire, light, fuel, and water—considerably over the amount allowed. The clerks at present employed are kept busy at work each day from 6.30 in the morning till 10 and 11 o'clock at night. It is safe to say that the work in the Fargo post-office during the past year has increased over 50 per cent. * * * I would respectfully recommend that the Department take into favorable consideration the extraordinary expenses that Mr. Grant has been to in conducting the work of the Fargo post-office, and that he be reimbursed to the following amounts, namely:

Clerk-hire		$3,920 82
Less allowance		2,000 00	1,920 82
Light	153 00
Less electric	53 00	100,00
Fuel		140 00
		240 00
Less allowance		100 00
			140 00
Water			55 32
Total			2,116 14

* * * * * * *

"'I also recommend that the present allowance for clerk-hire, &c., be increased from $2,100 to $5,400 per annum, namely:

Clerk-hire	$5,110 00
Fuel	140 00
Light	100 00
Water	50 00
	5,400 00

"This is only for the year 1882.

"James N. Tyner, First Assistant Postmaster-General, while Mr. Grant was postmaster at Fargo, says that Mr. Grant's requests for additional allowance for clerk-hire were refused solely on the supposition that the appropriation for that purpose would not admit of it, and that the merits of the case were never examined.

"During the fiscal year 1878-'79 Mr. Grant paid for clerk-hire $1,165 more than he received for that purpose, only $125 being allowed; the next year $500 was allowed, and he paid $1,800 more; the next year $800 was allowed and $2,000 more paid; the next year $1,400 allowed and $1,985 more paid; and up to the end of the third quarter of 1882-'83, $1,500 was allowed him, and he paid $1,776 in addition, making a total of $8,726 paid out of his own pocket for clerk-hire, so that his post-office might be properly administered.

"But, as I stated above, after his resignation the Postmaster-General paid him $1,400, all he could out of the balance of the appropriation toward his claim, thus reducing it to $7,326.

"Immediately after Mr. Grant's resignation, and upon the recommendation of Inspector J. E. Stuart, $5,460 was allowed his successor annually for clerk-hire.

"James A. Small, who made an examination of the office in 1882, recommended that $2,169.41 be paid Mr. Grant for the year 1882; that being the amount expended by him in excess of the allowance for that year.

"Your committee think that Mr. Grant paid his money in honest endeavors to administer his office so as to properly meet the demands of a rapidly growing town; that he was not allowed sufficient money for clerk-hire from the Post-Office Department because of an honest belief in that Department that the appropriation for general clerk-hire was not sufficient to permit additional payments, and not because the Department did not consider his demands just and proper.

"Postmaster-General Gresham, in a letter under the date of February 6, 1884, to Hon. JAMES M. RIGGS, of the House of Representatives, says:

"'I am of opinion that the claim is meritorious, and that it should receive the favorable consideration of Congress.'

"Your committee are therefore of the opinion that the claim is just, and recommend the passage of the bill."

The present bill calls for $376 less than the bill before the Forty-eighth Congress, and for the following reason: Under date of January 10, 1885, Postmaster-General Hatton approved and allowed the entire amount of Grant's claim, and referred it to the Sixth Auditor. The Auditor included it in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, who reported it to the House of Representatives in his regular estimate for deficiencies for the year 1885 and prior years. When this estimate came before the House Committee on Appropriations the amounts allowed Grant for the years 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882 were struck out and only the amount for 1883 allowed to remain.

The course of that committee seems inexplicable, for the Postmaster-General had reported the whole amount for payment in one order.

Your committee think the merits of the claim are unchanged, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES W. DYER.

The bill (S. 1071) for the relief of Frances W. Dyer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $100 to Frances W. Dyer, administratrix of the estate of William P. Dyer, late of Belfast, Me., deceased, being the amount deposited with the clerk of the United States court for the district of Alabama by William P. Dyer on his recognizance to appear and answer to a suit for an alleged violation of section 5347 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in which said suit the entry of nolle prosequi was made, and the sum of $100 was covered into the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WETMORE & BROTHER.

The bill (S. 211) for the relief of Wetmore & Brother, of Saint Louis, Mo., which was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims February 18, 1886, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Worcester Willey of $10,000; to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions of $2,000; and to Esther Smith of $500, in full of all their respective claims against the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE February 18, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith, having considered the same, adopt the favorable report made by the Senate Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress, prepared by Mr. PIKE, the following of which is a copy, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill:

"[Senate Report No. 683, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]
